The injunction inhibits the defendants from combining, conspiring or attempting to interfere with appellee's employés, so as wilfully to bring about the breaking of their contracts of service with the appellee which appellee now has with its employés; from hindering or obstructing any of the business of appellee, its agents, servants or employés in the discharge of their duties, or in any manner obstructing appellee's business, with the purpose of compelling or inducing, by threats, intimidation, violence, violent or abusive language, or persuasion, any of the employés of the appellee to refuse or fail to perform their duties as such employés; from compelling or inducing or attempting to compel or induce, by threats, intimidation, force or violence, or abusive or violent language, any of the employés of plaintiff to leave its service, or refuse to perform their duties as such employés; or in such manner to prevent others seeking employment from accepting employment with the appellee. From entering or establishing a picket or pickets of men on, or patrolling the railroad or street cars passing through or adjacent to appellee's property, for the purpose of inducing or compelling, by threats, intimidation, violence, violent or abusive language, or persuasion, any employé of plaintiff to fail or refuse to perform his duties. Or for the purpose of interfering or talking to any person or persons on said railroad or street cars going to appellee's mine to accept employment with appellee, for the purpose and with the intention of inducing or compelling them, by threats, violence, intimidation, violent or abusive language, or in any manner whatsoever, to refuse or fail to accept service with appellee, from congregating at or near the premises of the appellee, and from picketing or patrolling said premises for the purpose of intimidating appellee's employés, or coercing them by threats, intimidation, violence, abusive or violent language, or preventing them from rendering their service to appellee, and in like manner from inducing or coercing them to leave the employment of appellee, and from in any manner so interfering with appellee in carrying on its busi-857 ness in its usual and ordinary way, and from interfering by threats, intimidation or violence, or violent and abusive language, any person or persons who may be employed or seeking employment by appellee, in appellee's mine and works; from either singly or in combination with others, congregating in and about the approaches to appellee's mine and works for the purpose of picketing or patrolling or guarding the streets or approaches to appellee's mine, for the purpose of intimidating, threatening or coercing any of appellee's employés from working in its mine or works, or any person seeking employment there- from entering into such employment, and from so interfering with said employés in going to and from their daily work in and about the mine and works of appellee; and, finally, from either singly or collectively going to the house or boarding houses of appellee's employés, or any of them, for the purpose of intimidating or coercing any or all of them to leave the appellee's employment.

It will be observed that the injunction was based upon the finding that the defendants had resorted to the use of force, violence, intimidation, abusive and violent language, and coercion as a means of obtaining membership in the United Mine Workers of America, from the appellee's employés, and also for the purpose of having these employés quit the service of the appellee, or by such means preventing others seeking employment with it from accepting its service as employés.

The appellee will hereinafter be referred to as "plaintiff," and the appellants as "defendants," such being the relative positions the parties occupied in the court below.

The facts are substantially as follows:

The Hitchman Coal and Coke Company was organized under the laws of the State of West Virginia, in the year 1901, and began operations at Benwood, Ohio County, West Virginia, in the early summer of that year. The opening up of the mine consumed some time, and the actual mining of coal did not commence until in the winter of 1902. At that time, however, the company did not ship any coal. The company began its operations upon a non-858 union basis; that is, it employed its labor independently of and without relation to the organization known as the United Mine Workers of America.

It appears from the testimony of E. T. Hitchman that previous to its entering upon the operation of mining coal at Benwood, the Hitchman Company entered into a contract with the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company; and during the early part of its operations all the coal mined by the company was delivered upon the engines of the railroad company; the amount mined at first was very small; it practically commenced at nothing and gradually increased, until now this mine is a regular coaling station for the railroad company, and is its only coaling station in the vicinity of Benwood.

The coal company continued to operate its mine upon a non-union basis until the month of April, 1903, when it entered into a contract with its employés through the officers of the United Mine Workers of America, adopting the scale of wages demanded by the members of that organization, and agreeing to observe the rules and conditions of employment.

The company operated its mine upon what is known as a "union basis," for three years, or until some time in April, 1906; the first contract of agreement expired in 1904, and was renewed for a period of two years, or until April, 1906. At that time the men refused to work longer because no agreement could be made between the employés and the company as to the rate of wages and conditions of employment.

About June 21, 1906, after the mine had been shut down and operations suspended for a period of about fifty days, the company resumed operations upon a non-union basis, with the understanding between the officials of the company and its employés that the company would deal with each one of them individually from that time on, and that the men who had formerly been in the employ of the company were informed by its president that each man would have to seek employment for himself, and that the company would have no further relations with the organization known as the United Mine Workers of America.

After resuming operations in June, 1906, it was agreed between the company and its employés that the company's mine 859 would be operated upon a non-union basis; its board of directors passed a resolution whereby a fixed policy was adopted by the company to employ none but non-union laborers; the agreement of employment between the company and its men was verbal up to January, 1908, but about that time and since the institution of this suit the company issued employment cards, the exact language of which will be hereinafter quoted and referred to. Thereafter, each and every man who entered the company's employment was required to sign one of the cards in question before being accepted as an employé; and any applicant for employment who refused to sign the card was denied employment.

It appears from the testimony of R. J. Coits an employé of the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company that from and after June, 1906, up to and including the date of the taking of the testimony herein, the Hitchman Coal and Coke Company continued to operate its mine upon a non-union basis, with an understanding or agreement between it and its employés, that the company would employ none but men who were not members of the United Mine Workers of America; and from January 1, 1908, the men on their part agreed that they would not become members of the United Mine Workers of America so long as they continued in the employment of that company.

During all this time, from the early part of 1902 up to the time of the taking of testimony on behalf of the plaintiff in this case, the business of the Hitchman Coal and Coke Company has increased naturally and gradually, from a production and sale of about 17,000 tons of coal in 1902, to a production and sale of more than 281,000 tons for the first eleven months of the year 1910.

In the year 1902, all but about 800 tons of the coal produced by the Hitchman Company was sold to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, and delivered upon its engines at Benwood, West Virginia; while in 1910 more than half of the coal produced was sold in the open market and was designated upon the books of the coal company as "commercial coal" as distinguished from "engine coal"; and nearly all of this "commercial coal" was 860 shipped to ports on the Great Lakes for transportation by vessel to the northwest country, for delivery at ports on Lake Superior.

Witness Cotts further testified that during all these years the prices received by the coal company for both "commercial coal" and "engine coal" would average from ninety-five cents to one dollar per ton; but during the time of the strike in the anthracite fields during the year 1903, the price for "commercial coal," prior to April 1, of that year, was about three dollars per ton, and also during this time, at the average price of from ninety-five cents to one dollar per ton, the average profit derived by the coal company from the mining and shipping and selling of coal was twenty-five cents per ton.

It also appears from the testimony of W. H. Koch, manager of the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company, that during the summer of 1907 the officials at that time in charge of the affairs of the United Mine Workers of America for the district in which the Hitchman Company's mine is located called upon the officers of the coal company, and discussed with them the renewal of the relations which had theretofore existed between that company and the miners' organization; at each of these meetings, at least one of which was held in the company's office, the officers of the company refused to consider the renewal of their former relations to the union, and the representatives of the United Mine Workers were informed that it was the fixed and determined policy of that company to employ none but miners who were not members of the union, and in September, 1907, about six weeks after the visit of the officials as above stated, Thomas Hughes, a representative of the United Mine Workers, visited Benwood and its vicinity in an attempt to induce the miners employed by the Hitchman and other coal companies operating in that community, to become members of the United Mine Workers.

Witness Koch further testified that in his work as organizer, of soliciting and securing miners to become members of the union, Hughes talked to the employés of the Hitchman and other companies upon the streets of Benwood, and, according to Wesley Corns' testimony, visited the men at their homes, and it is shown by 861 E. C. Pickett's testimony that Hughes addressed the men in open meetings, and talked with one or more of the officers of the coal company as to the reason why that company refused to employ any but non-union labor.

E. C. Pickett also testified that in an open air meeting which was attended by the superintendent of the coal company, Hughes simply argued to the men the advantages to be derived from the membership in the United Mine Workers of America.

It further appears from E. C. Pickett's testimony that as a result of the efforts of Hughes, about twenty or twenty-five men employed by the Glendale Coal Company, a separate corporation, but managed from the same office and by the same men in charge of the operations of the Hitchman Company, were induced to become members of the United Mine Workers, and the next morning they were discharged by the superintendent of the Hitchman Company. This was in the latter part of September or the first of October, 1907.

We fully appreciate the important bearing the questions here presented have upon the welfare of the mine owners, as well as the laboring men, and are not unmindful of the delicate issues raised by the pleadings and proof in this cause.

That it is advisable to secure a just and fair solution of the labor problem by which equal protection to capital and labor may be secured is undoubtedly the wish of every patriotic citizen regardless of his station in life. That one who toils for his living is justified in employing all lawful methods for the preservation of his right as an American citizen to secure fair remuneration for his services, is established by the Federal and the State Courts. That such a person also has the right to join with others similarly situated, in order to promote their welfare as a class, is also established as the law of this country. But while this is so, it is equally well settled that the mine owner is entitled to the full protection of the law in the conduct of his business and the enjoyment of his property.

It is insisted by counsel that the defendants as members of the organization known as the United Mine Workers of America have been within their rights as to the transactions referred to in 862 the bill, and that they have not resorted to intimidation, violence or other unlawful methods, but, on the other hand, have been actuated solely by a desire to promote the general welfare of those who are employed as laborers in the various coal mines of the country, and that they have not at any time attempted to unionize plaintiff's mine as alleged in the bill.

The plaintiff insists that it has the right to employ only non-union labor, and that the conduct of the defendants in attempting to unionize this class of labor in the State of West Virginia is unlawful in that it is a violation of the constitution, the common law, and the statute law of that State.

The defendants insist that the policy adopted by the plaintiff is calculated to place those who seek employment of this kind at a great disadvantage; that it will prevent them from accomplishing by united effort that which is essential to the welfare of those whose only asset is their ability to earn a living by manual labor and that the action of the plaintiff in this instance in making an indirect attack upon their organization is such as to justify this class of laboring men in employing all lawful methods for the purpose of maintaining their organization, the only means by which they can protect their rights and promote their welfare.

It has heretofore been conceded, as a general rule, that a labor union may employ peaceable and persuasive methods for the purpose of keeping its organization intact, and thus enable it to care for those in distress, secure as high wages as possible, and, by united effort, secure the enactment of laws requiring the proper equipment of mines so as to render them safe and sanitary, and to do other things calculated to improve the conditions under which they labor, but the decree in this instance somewhat modifies this rule.

he most important and far-reaching question is raised by the as-ment of error wherein it is insisted that the court below erred olding that the United Mine Workers of America and its sub-nate branches constitute an unlawful organization under the titution, the common law, and the statutory law of the State of West Virginia.

The learned judge who granted the injunction in this instance filed a very able and exhaustive opinion (202 Fed.,
, in which it is held, among other things, that the United e Workers of America is an unlawful combination at common which he insists is still in full force in that State, and in sup-thereof cites many English cases.

disposing of this case the court, among other things, said:
'or common law conspiracy, a number of the members of the s-unions were prosecuted for combining to raise wages and for declared purposes, and convictions were had."

ne court further said:

uch parts of the common law and of the laws of the State of inia as are in force within the boundaries of the State of West nia when this constitution (referring to the first constitution ed by the State prior to its admission into the Union) goes into tion, and are not repugnant thereto, shall be and continue the f this State until altered or repealed by the Legislature."

king this as a basis, the learned judge insists that the common nder which labor organizations have been declared unlawful ngland is still in force in West Virginia, and that, therefore, organization is unlawful, unless by statutory enactment the on law has been modified or abrogated to such an extent as to an organization of this kind to exist in that State.

do not deem it profitable to enter into an extended discussion is phase of the question, believing as we do that while there ecisions at common law by the courts of England in support contention that labor unions are unlawful, yet such rule has revailed in this country, except in a few of the earlier decisions courts. Even in England combinations of this character were proceeded against, as a general rule, when they were criminal or prohibited by statutory law.

1 Eddie on Combinations, sec. 404, 405, in referring to this question, says:

here seems to have been no rule of the common law against nations of workingmen, except where such combinations were of a criminal character or directly against some statutory ion.

here are some dicta to the effect that such combinations would lawful, and 'some traces may be found in the ancient books of rine that it is criminal for one man, independently of a comon, to oblige another, by bond or otherwise, to abstain from xercise of his proper craft or employment.' But even such has no direct relation to a combination; its legality or ille-rests upon considerations entirely foreign to those which cone validity of a combination.

"It is stated by an eminent authority that no case was ever cited prior to the year 1825, in which any person was convicted for a conspiracy in restraint of trade at common law for having combined with others for the raising of wages."

The following from Wright's Criminal Conspiracy is a note to the text under section 404:

"The text-books, down to at least 1800, appear to be silent as to the existence of any doctrine of the criminality at common law of combinations of masters of workmen. Neither in the earlier editions of Hawkins nor in East does the doctrine in question appear to be stated. So in the edition of Burn's Justice of 1810, it is not mentioned under the title 'conspiracy' and under the title 'servants' there are several statements of the statutes against combinations, but there is no reference to common law. The various acts against combinations for controlling masters or workmen which were passed in the eighteenth century (1725, 12 Geo. 1, ch. 34, extended by 1729, 22 Geo. 2, ch. 27, sec. 12; 1799, 39 Geo. 3, ch. 81; (1800) 39 & 40 Geo. 3, ch. 106, etc.), commence by declaring or enacting agreements for such purposes theretofore made to be 'illegal, null and void,' which would not have been necessary if they had been thought to be criminal at common law; and they then proceeded by independent enactment to make it punishable in the future to engage in them.

"The result of the whole appears to be that there is not sufficient authority for concluding that before the close of the eighteenth century there was supposed to be any rule of common law that combinations for controlling masters or workmen were criminal, except where the combination was for some purpose punishable under a statute expressly directed against such combinations, or was for conduct punishable independently of combination."

However, assuming it to be true that at the time the common law was incorporated as a part of the law of West Virginia, labor unions formed for the purpose of securing a higher rate of wages were held at common law by the English Courts to be a criminal conspiracy, yet we do not consider the same as now binding upon our courts, in view of the changed conditions in this, as well as other countries, incident to industrial development.

In the case of Everett Waddy Company v. Typographical Union, 105 Va., 188, the Supreme Court of that State said:

In the case of Everett Waddy Company v. Typographical Union, States and of the highest courts of a majority of the States in the Union that labor may organize as capital does for its own protection and to further the interest of the laboring class. They may 'strike' and persuade and induce others to join them, but when they resort to unlawful means to cause injury to others to whom they have no relation, contractual or otherwise, the limit permitted by law is passed and they may be restrained. Gray v. Trades' Council (Minn.), 97 N. W., 663; 63 L. R. A., 753; Am. St., 477, and cases there cited; Murdock v. Walker, 152 Pa., 195, 25 Alt., 492, 34 Am. St., 678; Otis Steel Company v. Local Union No. 218, 110 Fed., 700; Consol. S. & W. Co. v. Murray, 80 Fed., 810; Union Pac. R.

Co. v. Beuff, 120 Fed., 102; Allis-Chalmers Company v. Loge, 111 Fed., 264; Beck v. Railway Union (Mich.), 77 N. W., 13, 42 L. R. A., 407; 74 Am. St., 421; Plant v. Woods, 176 Mass., 492, 57 N. E., 1011; 51 L. R. A. 339, 79 Am. St., 330; Eddy on Comb., vol. 2, secs. 1031, 1035; Beech on Mono. and Indus. Trusts, secs. 98, 100, 102; Tideman on St. and Fed. Control of Persons and Property, vol. 1, sec. 114

"In many of the States of the Union there are statutes which provide for the incorporation of trades union and other labor organizations, and in all of them one of the permissible objects of incorporation is declared to be securement of better terms of employment; while at common law, as interpreted by the English 866 decisions and a few of the earliest decisions of the courts in this country, labor combinations formed for the purpose of controlling the rate of wages were regarded as a criminal conspiracy. But these early decisions of the courts of this country were soon departed from other cases, notably in Massachusetts, New York, and Pennsylvania, which placed labor combinations upon a plane of legal equality with capitalistic combinations, by holding that it was not a criminal conspiracy for workmen to combine for the purpose of enhancing the rate of wages, or for improving in any other way their relations with employers."

Also in the case of Carew v. Rutherford, 106 Mass., 14, the court in discussing this question said:

"* * * And it is no crime for any number of persons, without an unlawful object in view, to associate themselves together and agree that they will not work for or deal with certain men or classes of men, or work under a certain price, or without certain conditions. Commonwealth v. Hunt, 4 Met., 111; Boston Glass Manufactory v. Binney, 4 Pick., 425; Bowen v. Matheson, 14 Allen, 499.

"This freedom of labor and business has not always existed. When our ancestors came here, many branches of labor and business were hampered by legal restrictions created by English statutes, and it was a long time before the community fully understood the importance of freedom in this respect. Some of our early legislation is of this character. One of the colonial acts, entitled 'An act against oppression punished by fine and imprisonment such indisposed persons as may take the liberty to oppress and wrong their neighbors by taking excessive wages for their work, or unreasonable prices for merchandise or other necessary commodity as may pass from man to man. Anc. Chart., 172. Another required artificers, or handcraftmen/ to meet to labor, to work by the day for their neighbors, in mowing, reaping of corn and the -inning thereof. Id., 210. Another act regulated the price of bread. Id., 752. Some of our town records show, that under the power to make by-laws the towns fixed the prices of labor, provisions and several articles of merchandise, as late as the time of the revolutionary war. But experience and increasing intelligence led to the abolition of all such restrictions, and to the establishment of freedom for all branches of labor and business, and all persons who have been born and make their own contracts not only elevates their condition, but secures to skill and industry and economy their appropriate advantages."

The growth and development of the common law occurred when property rights were recognized as paramount to personal rights. At that time there was little if any concert of action on the part of the laboring people, owing to their helpless condition, due in the main to their ignorance. Their domination by the land owner and capitalist was absolute in most respects, and as a result they were as helpless as those held in slavery before our great war. Under such circumstances it is no wonder that we have many decisions in the past at common law, as well as the enactment of statutory laws, by virtue of which it was almost a physical impossibility for those who earned their living by honest toil to accomplish, by organized effort, those things necessary to elevate them to a plane where they could assert those rights so essential to their welfare.

The industrial development of the world within the last half century has been such as to render it necessary for the courts to take a broader and more comprehensive view than formerly of questions pertaining to the relation that capital sustains to labor.

The first syllabus in the case of Powell v. Sims (5 W. Va., 1), is in the following language:

"The common law of England is in force in this State only so far as it is in harmony with its institutions, and its principles applicable to the State of the country and the condition of society."

The following cases are to the same effect: Baylor v. Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company, 9 W. Va., 270; Shively v. Bowlby, 152 U. S., 1; Tunstall v. Christian, 80 Va., 1.

In view of the industrial changes indicated, many great problems are now presented to the courts that were wholly unknown at the time when many of the cases relied upon by plaintiff 868 were decided. It is now recognized by all civilized countries that labor is the basis of all wealth, and without which it is utterly impossible to accomplish anything in the industrial world, and such being the case, the laboring man is entitled to the fullest protection in the assertion of his right to demand adequate pay for any labor that he may perform.

Foreign immigration is increasing rapidly. Statistics show that over a million foreigners land on our shores annually, a majority of whom, owing to their former environments, are not capable of understanding and appreciating what it means to be an American citizen. A large percentage of this class of workmen are employed as miners. While we have no comment to make as to the advisability of restricting immigration (that being a matter which rests solely with the legislative branch of our government), yet we cannot shut our eyes to the conditions that exist as a result of this policy. That this class of labor, a vast number of whom are unable to read and write or understand our language, can secure a more substantial recognition of their rights as members of a labor union is undoubtedly true, and so long as these people are among us for the purpose of earning a living and thereby improving their condition, and at the same time adding to the wealth of our country, it is the duty of this government to afford them equal protection under our constitution and the laws passed in pursuance thereof. That there is at this time a well defined struggle between capital and labor, each trying to protect its rights from its own point of view, is a condition and not a theory.

In this connection it is pertinent to consider the purposes of the United Mine Workers of America, which is composed of three branches, to-wit: National, District and Sub-District, all of which were declared to be unlawful by the lower court. In the preamble of the National Constitution of the organization is to be found a declaration of the purposes for which it was established, which is as follows:

"There is no fact more generally known, or more widely believed, than that without coal there would not have been any such grand achievements, priviliges and blessings as those which char-869 acterize the twentieth century civilization, and believing as we do, that those whose lot it is to daily toil in the recesses of the earth, mining and putting out coal which makes these blessings possible, are entitled to a fair and equitable share of the same; therefore we have formed 'The United Mine Workers of America,' for the purpose of the more readily securing the object sought by educating all mine workers in America to realize the necessity of union of action and purpose, in demanding and securing by lawful means the just fruits of our toil. And we hereby declare to the world that our objects are:

"First—To secure an earning fully compatible with the dangers of our calling and the labor performed.

"Second. To establish as speedily as possible, and forever, our right to receive pay, for labor performed, in lawful money, and to rid ourselves of the iniquitous system of spending our money wherever our employers see fit to designate.

"Third. To secure the introduction of any and all well defined and established appliances for the preservation of life, health and limbs of all mine employes.

"Fourth. To reduce to the lowest possible minimum the awful catastrophes which have been sweeping our fellow-craftsmen to untimely graves by the thousands; by securing legislation looking to the most perfect system of ventilation, drainage, etc.

"Fifth. To enforce existing laws; and where none exist, enact and enforce them; calling for a plentiful supply of suitable timber for supporting the roofs, pillars, etc., and to have all working places rendered as free from water and impure air and poisonous gases as possible.

"Sixth. To uncompromisingly demand that eight hours shall constitute a day's work, and not more than eight hours shall be worked in any one day by any mine worker. The very nature of our employment, shut out from the sunlight and impure air, working by the aid of artificial light (in no instance to exceed one candle power), would in itself, strongly indicate that, of all men, a coal miner has the most righteous claim to an eight-hour day.

870 "Seventh. To provide for the education of our children by laws prohibiting their employment until they have attained a reasonably satisfactory education, and in every case until they have attained fourteen years of age.

"Eighth. To abrogate all laws which enable coal operators to cheat the miners, and to substitute laws which will enable the miner, under the protection and majesty of the State, to have his coal properly weighed or measured, as the case may be.

"Ninth. To secure by legislation, weekly payments in lawful money.

"Tenth. To render it impossible, by legislative enactment in every State, for coal operators or corporations to employ Pinkerton detectives or guards, or other forces (except the ordinary forces of the State) to take armed possession of the mines in case of strikes or lockouts.

"Eleventh. To use all honorable means to maintain peace between ourselves and employers; adjusting all differences, so far as possible by arbitration and conciliation, that strikes may become unnecessary."

The constitution of District 6 contains the same declaration of purposes, with the following added:

"Twelfth. And to use all honorable means to elect members of our organization to legislate and enforce laws in State and National legislative assemblies that will bear equally upon all citizens of the United States, its territories and other dominions.

"And we further declare it to be the purpose of District 6, United Mine Workers of America, to give moral and material aid to all its members in good standing and to those who may be dependent upon them, and to render such assistance as may be possible to all our members socially and financially, and to create a relief fund for members in distress, subject to the discretion of the officers and Executive Board of District 6, United Mine Workers of America, as hereinafter provided."

The court below in its opinion referred to a number of provisions contained in the constitution and rules of this organization 871 which in its judgment rendered the same unlawful, the first being that a member is required to promise that he will cease to work whenever called upon to do so by the organization.

A careful examination of this provision fails to show on its face anything unlawful, while on the other hand common experience teaches us that a rule of this character is essential for the preservation of labor organizations. Without a provision of this kind, there would be no power of securing concert of action; no means by which united effort could be secured for the accomplishment of the aims and purposes of the organization. In the absence of proof to the contrary, it must be assumed that this power would be exercised wisely, and only when necessary to promote the interest of the organization in a legitimate manner. It would be inconsistent with reason to assume that this power would be exercised so as to prevent the operation of a mine, which would necessarily defeat the very object for which this organization was established, to-wit: the procurement of steady employment at remunerative wages.

The court below was also of the opinion that under the rules of the organization a member could be held as a slave, and thus prevented from exercising his own free will. We fail to find any provision preventing one from ceasing to work at any time he may desire, and if he should do so, he would no longer be a member of the organization. One could also cease to be a member of the union by failing to pay his dues. Under these circumstances there is no possibility of one's being held as a member of the union contrary to his wishes.

The court below was further of the opinion that the union has the power to cause miners to become members thereof. We fail to find anything in the rules to justify the assumption that the union has an arbitrary power, by violence, intimidation or otherwise, to compel one to become a member of the organization. While it is alleged in the bill that the United Mine Workers of America is a secret, voluntary organization, this allegation is not only denied by the answer, but is shown to be incorrect by at least three witnesses, 872 who testified that they were familiar with the organization and its workings, that it is not a secret organization in the ordinary acceptation of the term.

Witness Savage, Secretary-Treasurer of District No. 6, United Mine Workers of America, among other things, testified that "The United Mine Workers of America was established and organized in 1890, at Indianapolis, Indiana, but the first ground work was laid at Columbus, Ohio; it is an open organization."

Witness Lewis, President of the United Mine Workers of America since 1908, and from April 1, 1900, until March 31, 1908, Vice-President of the United Mine Workers of America, testified, among other things, that "There is nothing secret about the United Mine Workers, as was stated by Mr. McKinley. The only thing as to which there is any secret is what is called a joint meeting, when there is a joint scale committee meeting; then the operators request that the representatives of the press be kept out. That is for the purpose of keeping the representatives of the press from knowing their inside business. A stenographer takes the proceedings of the district and national conventions, and they are published; records of the meetings of the local unions are kept by the secretary; and any person who is interested who desires may go and examine the records of a local union."

Witness Sullivan, who was serving his second year as President of District 6, United Mine Workers of America, testified as follows:

"The United Mine Workers has always been an open organization; any one is at liberty to enter the conventions or local meetings who desires; its literature is for the public as well as for the members; there is nothing connected with it that is sought to be withheld from the public."

The court below was also of the opinion that the rules of the organization undertake to "control or rather abrogate and destroy the right of the employer to contract with the men independent of the organization." If it is meant by this statement that 873 under the rules it is possible by peaceable, persuasive and other lawful methods to induce a majority, if not all, of the miners of any particular locality to join the union and thereby place the mine owner in a position where it may be necessary for him to negotiate with union labor in order to operate his mines, then the conclusion reached by the court below is entirely correct. However, the fact that such a result would be possible under this rule could not in any way affect the legality of the organization, because it has been repeatedly held by the courts that a labor union may use all lawful methods for the purpose of inducing others to join its order, and until the contrary is shown, it must be assumed that only lawful methods are to be employed for the accomplishment of such purpose.

In the case of My Maryland Lodge v. Adt. (Md.), 68 L. R. A., 752-7, the court said:

"* * * * They may even use persuasion to have others join their organization. They have an unquestionable right to present their cause to the public in newspapers or circulars in a peaceable way, but with no attempt at coercion. If ruin to the employer results from their peaceable assertion of these rights, it is a damage without remedy."

To the same effect is the case of Beck v. Railway, etc., Union, 48 Mich., 497.

Another ground relied upon by the court below is that the organization assumes the right through its officers, (1) to control the employer's business, (2) to shut down his mine by calling out men in obedience to their obligation whenever it is deemed to be to the interest of the union, regardless of the employer's interest, or the effect that such act may have upon him as regards loss, damage or necessary violation, on account thereof, of his existing contracts with others.

Relative to this question the witness, McKinley, a member of the plaintiff organization, testified, among other things, that it was the desire of the union, as he understood it, to have every employe in and about the bituminous coal mines of the United States and Canada, as well as the Anthracite mines, a member of the United 874 Mine Workers of America. It is admitted to be the purpose of this organization to induce all miners to join the union, and until the contrary is shown, it must be assumed that only lawful methods are to be employed by it for that purpose.

Witness Lewis also testified that "it is not now, and never has been the policy of the United Mine Workers' organization to use force or coercion or any unlawful methods to promote its jurisdiction or the growth of the organization, and the moment they attempt to extend their power or usefulness by that means instantly they will go out of existence." The witness further testifying says: "As to the statement of the witness, J. C. McKinley, that he thinks probably the first method of promoting the growth of the United Mine Workers is to ask the operators to compel the men to join the union," says he "never heard of that before: that its policy is to go into a community where there is a mine and get acquainted with some of the men who work there, and talk to them about the organization, and get them interested in joining; and after a sufficient number could be gotten together to agree that it was a good thing to join the union, a meeting would be called to organize those men, just the same as any other fraternal society."

In this connection it should be borne in mind that the defendants as members of this organization cannot secure employment in any mine without first entering into an agreement with operators as to the terms upon which they are to work. In other words, it is optional with the operators as to whether they shall operate their mines, and further as to whether they shall employ union labor.

It is also insisted by the court below that under these rules the operator has no right to employ non-union men even if he should desire to do so.

If the United Mine Workers of America in pursuance of this rule should resort to coercion, threats, intimidation or violence for the purpose of preventing the mine owner from employing non-union men, such conduct would be unlawful, and the courts would promptly restrain any one who might be a party to such 875 transaction. Indeed, it would be unlawful for an individual to undertake, by coercion, intimidation or threats to prevent a mine owner from exercising his own free will as to the employment of non-union laborers, or as to any other thing which he might deem necessary to be done in order to protect his property rights.

However, in this instance, the plaintiff has adopted a policy by which only non-union men may be employed. If the plaintiff may for the purpose of protecting its interests adopt a policy by which only non-union men can secure employment at its mines, and such conduct be sanctioned by the law, by what process of reasoning can it be held that the defendants may not adopt the same method in order to protect their interests? If the plaintiff is to be protected in the use of such methods, and the defendants are to be restrained from using lawful methods for the purpose of successfully meeting the issue thus raised by the plaintiff, then indeed it may be truthfully said that capital receives greater protection at the hands of the courts than those through whose efforts capital in the first instance was created. But such is not the law, and when we consider the testimony as respects the conduct of the defendants, at and before the institution of this suit, we are of the opinion that the plaintiff has not by a preponderance of the evidence, shown that these defendants employed unlawful methods as alleged in the bill.

At one time this identical mine employed union labor, and in all probability would have continued to do so, had it not been for a controversy which arose as to certain adjustments and the parties failing to reach an agreement the plaintiff decided to employ only non-union labor.

It further appears that the plaintiff is paying the non-union men the same wages that are being paid union men. Therefore, under these circumstances, is it not as reasonable to infer that the plaintiff is endeavoring to place the laborers of that section in a position where it would be master of the situation, as it is to infer that the defendants are seeking to destroy the business of the plaintiff?

While it is true that the plaintiff has a perfect right to refuse 876 to employ union labor, is it not equally true that union labor, as we have stated, may by the employment of legitimate means, do that which is necessary to keep its forces together?

Surely we have not reached the point when capital with its strong arm may adopt a plan like this for protecting its interests, while on the other hand the laboring classes are to be denied the protection of the law when they are attempting to assert rights that are just as important to their well-being as are the rights of those who have been more fortunate in accumulating wealth. He who "seeks equity must do equity." In other words he "must come into court with clean hands." If the courts of this country should by injunctive relief protect the mine owner in the enjoyment of his property rights, and restrain the laboring people from organizing their forces by declaring such organization unlawful, would not the mine owner then be in a position to control the situation so that he who has to toil for his daily bread would be placed in a position where if he exists at all, he must do so at such wages, and upon such terms as organized capital may see fit to dictate. However, we do not wish to be understood as intimating that the plaintiff or a majority of those who employ labor in this country would take advantage of a situation of this kind for the purpose of oppressing those who are at their mercy. The instances where such a course is pursued are exceptional. Thousands of manufacturing plants all over the country, as well as railroad companies and mining companies, are today of their own accord employing union labor, realizing as they do that such a policy on their part is to the advantage of the employer as well as the employee. In fact, under our constitution and laws, no undue advantages are given to either capital or labor, nor will the courts ever permit individuals or labor organizations by force, fraud or intimidation to prevent the mine owner from lawfully protecting his rights, but while this is true, equal protection should be guaranteed to labor and capital.

It was further held by the court below that under the rules of the organization the power is given to limit the right of the employer in the absence of contract to discharge whom he pleases, when he pleases, and for what he pleases. A careful examination of 877 the constitution of the National, District and Sub-District organizations fails to disclose anything to justify this conclusion.

We have carefully examined the constitution to ascertain whether there can be found therein a rule or provision which authorizes the control of the employer's business by the organization, but find nothing to sustain this view, unless it be based on certain incidents in connection with the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company while it ran its mines union.

The witness, McKinley, in speaking of the United Mine Workers, said:

"The term, a union mine, is one over which they have absolute control, and a non-union mine, one which is worked open shop, or in which the United Mine Workers are not recognized."

This statement as respects the extent to which the union assumes control over a union mine is flatly contradicted by the witness Savage, as well as by the testimony of Lewis and Sullivan. The witness Sullivan said:

"If the mine of the Hitchman Company had become unionized, the men would obey the management of the mine and not the orders of the union; they could not remain in the union and disobey the directions and orders of the operators, against the wishes of the union. There are no rules of the organization whereby a unionized mine must submit its men to the paramount control of the union, and I have never known any such rules to be adopted by the organization."

He further testified that one of the many purposes of the organization is to fix a fair scale of wages that should be uniform, so far as possible, taking into consideration the varied conditions existing in the different sections of the coal mining territory. It should be borne in mind that the scale of wages is fixed by agreement between operators and miners. Experience teaches us that the complaint of an individual is treated with indifference as compared to the complaint that is made by an organized body of men. When 878 an individual makes a complaint, and it is refused, he must either quit work or submit to any terms that may be imposed upon him.

As a general rule employes of this kind possess but little property, owing to the fact that it requires the entire wages they earn to support their families from day to day. Under these circumstances they are unable to move from place to place to secure employment, and as a result they must accept such wages as may be offered.

Shutting down a mine by calling out men in obedience to their obligation is what is known as a "strike." Rule No. 10, which relates to strikes, is in the following language:

"No strikes shall take place at any time under the jurisdiction of Sub-District 5 of District 6, except for specific violation of agreement. That is, screens irregular; failure to pay on pay day without explanation; violation of mining laws by operators, or reductions from scale wages until the grievance of the mine affected has been thoroughly investigated by the officers of District 6, U. M. W. A. and operators interested. Any man or men that cause a stoppage of work at any mine in violation of this rule, shall be subject to dismissal at the will of the company."

This very clearly sets forth the causes wherein strikes are justifiable. The evidence in this case fails to show that these defendants have at any time tried by violence, intimidation, or fraud to induce the union men to quit working for the plaintiff.

A consideration of the purposes of this organization as set forth in its constitution impels us to the conclusion that there is nothing contained therein to justify the contention that its purposes are unlawful.

As we have already stated, we are of the opinion that even if at common law as originally adopted by the State of West Virginia, this organization was unlawful, it does not follow that that part of the common law is now applicable in that State, owing to the changed conditions to which we have referred. Nor do we find anything in the statute law of West Virginia to sustain the contention that this organization is illegal. The code of 1906, enacted 879 in 1890 (Acts, 1890, ch. 9, sec. 14), ch. 15, sec. 14, serial section 413, as amended in 1907 (Acts, 1907, ch. 78, sec. 19), among other things provides:

"Nor shall any person or persons, or combination of persons, by force, threats, menaces, or intimidation of any kind, prevent or attempt to prevent from working in or about any mine, any person or persons who have the lawful right to work about the same, and who desire to so work; but this provision shall not be so construed as to prevent any two or more persons from associating together under the name of knights of labor, or any other name they may desire, for any lawful purpose, or for using moral suasion or lawful argument to induce any one not to work in or about any mine."

This statute provides a penalty for its violation. Code, W. Va., Supp. 1909, sec. 413.

As amended it went into effect May 22, 1907, prior to the beginning of the institution of this suit, and this statute was enacted in 1890, the year in which the United Mine Workers of America were organized.

To say nothing of the legislative intent, the words of the foregoing statute by implication at least recognized labor unions. Referring to the use of labels or trademarks by labor unions, etc., there appears in the Code of 1906, as section 1, chapter 67, serial sec. 2859, the following language:

"Whenever any person, firm or corporation, or any association or union or working men, has heretofore adopted or used, or shall hereafter adopt or use any label, trademark, term, design, or device or form of advertisement for the purpose of designating, making known or distinguishing any goods, wares, merchandise, or other product of labor, as having been made, manufactured, such person, firm, corporation or association or union or working men, or by a member or members of such association or union, and shall register the same as provided in section three of this act, it shall be unlawful to knowingly counterfeit or imitate such label, trademark, term, design, device or form of advertisement, or knowingly use, sell, offer for sale, or in any way utter or circulate any counterfeit or imitation of such label, trademark, term, design, device or form of advertisement."

880 The fact that the legislature of that State enacted this statute, which has for its purpose the protection of labor unions in the use of what is known as a trade-mark, clearly indicates that the legislature recognized labor unions as lawful.

In the case of Tracy vs. Banker, 170 Mass., 270, the Supreme Court of that State uses the following language in regard to the effect of legislation of this kind:

"The label is part of the well known machinery of trades unions, and the use of it is found, if a finding is necessary, to be of value to the union and its members. It would not be traveling too far from the record, perhaps if we should assume that the use of the label is in fact, as certainly it might be, of far more economic importance to the union than are many or most of the trademarks, strictly so-called, which are protected by the courts. * * *

"It is impossible to believe that, when the statute mentions unincorporated unions, it does not refer to trade unions. It authorizes such to adopt, as well as to record, a label. Therefore it creates a it, if the court is unable to recognize one without its aid. If it plies to trade unions, it must be taken to apply to them as they inarily are; that is, as associations of workmen, not as manufurers or venders of goods. It contemplates that the labels would applied to merchandise, as of course they must be, and as these els are. * * *

"If, as we think, the statute expressly creates or recognizes the ht of trade unions to be protected in the use of labels for trade ion purposes, the suggestion that the association represented by plaintiff is an unlawful association falls of itself. It is too late make such a contention as to trade unions generally, even apart m the statute under which this suit is brought. But the general rposes of this union are similar, so far as we know, to the general rposes of other unions."

In view of what we have said as to the status of these organizations common law, and the further fact that there is an implied, if not rect recognition of labor unions by statute in West Virginia, and ere being no enactment declaring the same to be unlawful, we e of the opinion that the court below erred in declaring these organizations to be unlawful at common law.

51 At the final hearing the plaintiff introduced certain documentary evidence bearing upon the question as to whether the fendants had entered into a combination with operators and coal roducers in Ohio, Western Pennsylvania, Illinois and Indiana, ompetitive fields, to compel the plaintiff to submit to contractual lations with the United Mine Workers of America relating to the mployment of labor and production, contrary to the wishes of laintiff.

This evidence was offered in support of plaintiff's oral testimony, nd consisted of the proceedings of the various joint conferences of oal operators and coal miners of the States in question, held during he years 1906, 1907, 1908, 1910 and 1911; also book entitled Official Mining Scale of Association of Pittsburg Vein Operators f Ohio for their Mines in Belmont, Harrison and Jefferson Counties, Ohio, and the United Mine Workers of America;" also book entitled "United Mine Workers of America, District No. 6, Ohio. Issued by he Authority of the Executive Board of District No. 6 (Ohio Members), United Mine Workers of America. G. W. Savage, Secretary-Treasurer. For scale year April 1, 1908, to March 31, 1910;" also book entitled "Detailed Mining Scale for Sub-District 5 of District 6, U. M. W. of A. Effective from April 1, 1910, to March 31, 1912;" also "Excerpts from President T. L. Lewis' Report to the Twentieth Annual Convention of the United Mine Workers of America, held at Indianapolis, Indiana, in January, 1911, as published in the United Mine Workers Journal in its issue of January 19, 1911;" also "Expenditures of the United Mine Workers of America for the year 1910;" also "Income of the United Mine Workers for the year 1910."

Thirteen exhibits of this kind were introduced over the objections of counsel for defendants.

The court in referring to this phase of the question said:

"I further conclude that this Union, in pursuit of its unlawful purposes to secure control and the monopoly of mine labor, and to restrain, suppress, if not destroy, the coal mining industry of West Virginia in the interest of the co-conspirators, rival operators and producers in Ohio, Western Pennsylvania, Illinois and In-882 diana, competitive fields, have sought and will seek to compel the plaintiff, the Hitchman Coal and Coke Company, to submit to contractual relations with it as an organization, relating to the employment of labor and production contrary to the will and wish of said company; that its officers, in pursuance of such unlawful efforts to monopolize labor and restrain trade, and with knowledge of the express contracts existing between this plaintiff and its employees, have unlawfully sought to cause the breach of the said contracts on the part of its said employees."

The documentary evidence consisted of the declarations of a small percentage of the miners and operators who were present at these conferences. It was not shown that either before or after these declarations were made that those participating in the conference had entered into a conspiracy for an unlawful purpose. Indeed, these declarations were brought out in response to a proposition on the part of the miners for an increase of wages. A fair interpretation of the evidence shows that it was the purpose of the defendants to induce the miners of West Virginia to become members of the organization, and thereby secure as high wages as possible, compatible with the successful operation of the mines of that State by the respective owners. They had a perfect right to form a combination to accomplish such purposes by peaceable and lawful methods, and so long as they refrained from resorting to unlawful measures to effectuate the same they could not be said to be engaged in a conspiracy to unionize plaintiff's mine.

As we have already stated, the evidence fails to show that any unlawful methods were resorted to by these defendants in this instance. Therefore, the court erred in holding the organization to be unlawful upon the theory that it was guilty of a conspiracy.

The opinion of the court below is based upon the ground that the defendants, and those associated with them prior to, and at the time of the institution of this suit, had formed themselves into a conspiracy for the purpose of unionizing the plaintiff's mines without its consent, and for violation of the constitution, common, and statutory law of West Virginia.

883 Chief Justice Fuller in Pettibone vs. United States, 148 U. S., 197, defined conspiracy as follows:

"A conspiracy is a combination of two of more persons, by concerted action, to accomplish a criminal or unlawful purpose, or some purpose not in itself criminal or unlawful, by criminal or unlawful means."

Being of the opinion that this is a lawful organization, it necessarily follows that in order to entitle the plaintiff to the relief which it seeks, it must be made to appear that at, and before the institution of, this suit, the United Mine Workers of America were attempting to carry out the purposes of their organization by the use of unlawful means.

Considerable evidence was introduced by the plaintiff as to what occurred in the vicinity of the plaintiff's mine.

Paul Leonard, Superintendent of the Richland mine, was introduced, and among other things testified that he had met a man by the name of Thomas Hughes on the Richland Coal Company's property, and had had a talk with him in regard to the organization; that Hughes told him that it was his purpose to organize the Panhandle District of West Virginia. Among other things, the counsel put the following question to him:

"Q. What did you understand him to say his meaning was when he said that he was there to organize the Panhandle District?

A. Why, that he would make them join the United Mine Workers or tie them up, were the words he used to me."

Counsel also asked him the following question:

"Q. Did he (meaning Hughes) make any explanation as to what he meant by tying up the Panhandle?

A. That they would organize us and we would recognize the union." The witness further says: "My understanding of it was that if the company did not recognize this union that the mines would be shut down."

This was a threat by one who was without power to execute 884 same. Nowhere do we find any evidence tending to show that Hughes was authorized to shut down any of the mines of that vicinity. It should also be remembered that Leonard further testified that Hughes said nothing about the plaintiff's mine.

Austin, another witness for plaintiff, testified that he saw Hughes around there several times in the store and on the streets, and he also identified a card which was in the following language:

"Notice: To the Miners of the Hitchman mine. There will be a mass meeting Friday evening at 6:30 P. M., at Nick Heil's Base Ball Grounds for the purpose of discussing the principles of organization. President Green will be present. All miners are cordially invited to attend."

These people, the defendants assert, had a right to hold a meeting at the base ball grounds for the purpose of discussing in an orderly manner the matters that related to their organization, and that this is especially true, inasmuch as the meeting was called for a lawful purpose, and the public generally invited to attend.

Witness Knapp also testified that he had taken down and carried away one of the notices that had been posted on a telephone pole; that Hughes had stopped him in the street, just as he was entering a private driveway, and said things to him that he did not suppose should be repeated in the presence of the court; that he attacked him very maliciously and vigorously, and was very mad.

We fail to understand upon what grounds the plaintiff or its agents claimed the right to prevent the defendants from holding meetings for the purpose of discussing matters relating to their organization.

Robert Myers was also introduced as a witness by the plaintiff, and among other things, testified as follows:

"Q. Did you have any talk with a man by the name of Thomas Hughes?

A. I remember him; yes, sir.

885 Q. You remember a man by that name?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What was he doing there—if he was about the Hitchman Mine—if you recall?

A. Well, he explained to me that he was trying to organize the place again.

Q. What is that?

A. To organize the Hitchman coal miners again.

Q. What do you mean by organizing?

A. To get us organized—organized back into the United Mine Workers of America.

Q. What did he say to you?

A. Well, he said it would be very nice thing if we would go back again; and so he said if I would put my name down and give him fifty cents on a book (he did not show me the book, but said it had lots of names down on it of the Hitchman coal miners); he said if I would give him fifty cents I would be entitled to a union card to go any place and get a job, if the Hitchman company would fire me, and he would put my name down on his book.

Q. Did you give him the fifty cents?

A. No, sir.

Q. What did you say to him on that subject?

A. Well, I said I would not do anything like this; he might be a stranger and I did not know that he was the man that he said he was, and anyhow, I was awful careful in putting my name down to anything. He told me that he was a good friend of Mr. Koch, and that Mr. Koch had nothing against having the place organized again. He said he was a friend of his and I made the remark that I would ask Mr. Koch and see if it was so; and he said, no; that was of no use, because he was telling me the truth.

Q. Did he show you any book?

A. No, sir; I was trying to see the names on the book, but he would not show me anything. He told me he had it and I asked him how many names was on it and he said he had about enough to 'crack off.'

Q. What is that?

A. That is what I didn't understand.

Q. Did you ask him what he meant by 'crack off?'

A. The time was too short; no, sir. I was waiting for my street car to go home on and I went on the car.

Q. Did you say anything to Hughes about the job that you then had at the Hitchman mine?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Well, what did you say, if you can recollect?

A. Well, I told him that I didn't care much about being organized again, because I had too much experience already how it goes. I told him I was in several strikes and there wasn't anybody that helped me out, and I had to beg the company to get my job back again after I lost my job.

886 Q. Did you say anything to him about having any property?

A. Yes, sir; I told him it was impossible for me to go any place else, because I could not walk around with my property on my back and hunt another job. I says, 'I have work where I am now and as long as the company treats me as they are treating me, I will not do anything against them that they didn't like to have."

Mike Papage, another witness for the plaintiff, testified as follows:

"Q. What did he talk to you about?

A. Oh, he tried to get me along with him to help him out so he could get the Hitchman mine organized again.

Q. In what way did he ask you to help him?

A. To help him to get the people together, and everything, and he was to pay me for it.

Q. Were there at that time many men employed at the Hitchman mine who were foreigners?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you speak their language?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Could he speak their language?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did he want you to interpret—you understand what interpret means?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did he want you to interpret what he said to those men?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you do it?

A. No; I would tell him I won't do it.

Q. Then what did he say?

A. He got mad and went away.

Q. After that did you see him any more?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. How did he treat you after that? I mean how did he treat you when you did not agree to interpret for him?

A. Why, he came to my house—the second time he came to my house.

Q. You mean he came to your house a second time?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Then he had been there before?

A. No; not before.

Q. The second time you talked to him he came to your house. Is that the idea?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Well, what did he say then?

A. He tried to get me to interpret again, and promised me a good job and everything else.

Q. Did that appeal to you then? Did you agree to do it then or not?

A. No, sir; I would tell him I had nothing to do with him any more.

887 Q. Why did you tell him that?

A. They blamed me for not getting the men organized; they said it was my fault that the people kept on working.

Q. And that Hughes could not organize the mine?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did Hughes tell you that?

A. Yes, sir; he said that is what he heard off of the people.

Q. That is, you mean, the men that were working in the mine.

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did he tell you at any time how he was getting along?

A. No.

Q. Did he succeed in organizing the men there? Did he organize the men at the Hitchman mine?

A. No.

Q. Did the mine continue working while he was there?

A. Yes, sir."

James Stewart, another witness for the plaintiff, testified as follows:

"Q. Were you about the Hitchman mine working there in the fall of 1907, when Thomas Hughes was there?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you see Thomas Hughes there?

A. Yes, sir; I saw him there several times.

Q. Did you have any talk with him?

A. Yes, sir; I talked with him several times.

Q. Did you hear him talk with any other persons?

A. He was around there all the time and he was talking to everybody he would come to.

Q. To men employed at the Hitchman Mine?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did he tell you what he was there for?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What was it?

A. He told me he was there to try to organize the mine.

Q. Did he say what his business was?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What was it?

A. He said he was an organizer.

Q. For what?

A. For the United Mine Workers, and that he was there for that purpose. But I knew him before he came around there.

Q. You did know him before that?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What did he say to you, if anything, with relation to organizing the mine?

A. I do not remember all that he did say, but I remember one certain thing that he said. He told me during one night that he was going to have a meeting called up there. I do not know 888 what the date of it was, but it was in the latter part of August or first of September. He told me he had a couple of meetings there, but he did not seem to think it was any good; but he told me he was forming a kind of secret order among the men. He said he had a few men—he did not state the number of them—and he said each man was supposed to give him so much dues to keep it going; and then he said after he got the majority he would organize the place. He asked me what I had to say about it, and I told him my job at the present time was satisfactory and the men had agreed with the company not to organize and not to have anything to do with the organization, and I told him I did not want to have any trouble and nothing to say, anyway; and I think that was the last time I saw Hughes around there. I saw him after that across the river, but I didn't have any talk with him.

Q. Did he say anything to you about quitting work at the Hitchman and going to a union mine?

A. Yes, sir; he told me about it. He said he would get me a job, and I told him that might be all right about that, but I told him I did not think he could place me in any job any better than the one I had at the present time; and that is about as far as that went.

Q. You say you remember of some meeting being held?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What kind of a notice did he put out for the meetings?

A. Well, I could not just say about the notices.

Q. Did he mark on the pavements, or anything of that kind?

A. Well, there was names around there, about meetings, but I do not know whether he wrote them, or who wrote them. I could not state just what was on them, but we miners claimed that that was what the purpose was.

Q. Were there calls for meetings marked on the pavements?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. In chalk or some substance like that?

A. It was in chalk.

Q. White chalk?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was that done anywhere near the Hitchman mine?

A. Well, the one I saw was right in front of Wilhelm's saloon, on the sidewalk.

Q. Where is Wilhelm's saloon, with reference to the mine?

A. It was about 150 yards north of the mine.

Q. Did you attend any of the meetings that he held?

A. No.

Q. Did he say anything to you along the line of thought that unless you joined the union at that time, if the mine were unionized you would not get a job?

889 A. Yes, sir; he stated to me that if we did not go in the local, or stay away from there and work where mines were organized, that we would not ever be able to get a job in a union mine, but I have worked in two union mines since that, and had two union cards, and then came back to the Hitchman.

Q. Did you hear him talk with others along the same line?

A. Yes, sir; he talked with them all about the same, that I ever heard him talk to.

Q. Did you hear him tell them that unless they joined then, that if the mine was organized they would be out of a job and they could not get any?

A. He was talking to me and there was five or six or seven sitting there in a bunch, and they all heard just the same as I did about it.

Q. Did he say what he was going to do with the men when he got enough to organize?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What did he say he was going to do?

A. He stated when he got a majority he was going to organize the mine. I expect the meaning of it was that he was going to organize whether it was against the company or not.

Q. Did he say anything about shutting the mine down if they did not unionize it?

A. He stated it that way—that whenever he got a majority he was going to organize or they would close the place down.

Q. In point of fact, did he get a majority and unionize the mine or not?

A. No, sir; I think he failed."

On cross-examination, this witness further said:

"Q. Well, then, while he was there he was trying to get men to join the union?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And he invited you to join the union?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And told you he thought it would be better for you to join, didn't he?

A. Yes, sir; that is what he said.

Q. And he said if you worked there and happened to be discharged, you could not get into a union mine?

A. That is what he said.

Q. His idea was that there were a great many more union mines across over in Ohio than there were non-union, wasn't it?

A. I expect that was what he meant.

Q. Well, did he give you any further reasons why he thought it would be better for you to join the union?

A. No; not just exactly."

The foregoing was substantially all the evidence that was introduced as to what occurred in the vicinity of plaintiff's mine 890 prior to the institution of this suit, to show that the defendants had entered into a conspiracy as alleged.

While it is not denied by the defendants that they sought by peaceable methods to induce those employed by the plaintiff to join the union, yet they stoutly contend that at no time since the mine has been operated as a non-union mine have they employed unlawful methods. We fail to find that there is sufficient legal evidence to show that the defendants entered into a conspiracy or combination for the purpose of unionizing the plaintiff's mine. While there was evidence admitted by the court below as to statements made by certain officials of the United Mine Workers of America, and the coal operators of Pennsylvania and other States, bearing upon this question, yet there is no evidence to show that the United Mine Workers of America combined, or formed themselves into a conspiracy for the purpose of unionizing plaintiff's mines after it started to run its mine non-union in June, 1906.

The declarations of Hughes and Rankin are incompetent as against the organization, its officers and members, inasmuch as there is not sufficient legal evidence to establish the fact that the defendants as members of the United Mine Workers of America prior to and at the time of the institution of this suit formed a conspiracy, nor is there sufficient evidence to show that Rankin and Hughes were parties to such alleged conspiracy.

While Hughes was a representative of the organization, his authority only permitted him to use argument and persuasion to induce the employés to become members of the organization. This was shown by the evidence of the witness Savage.

A considerable portion of the evidence bearing upon the alleged unlawful conduct of the union in connection with the operation of the plaintiff's mine relates to the time that it was running its mine union, and the period intervening between the time it ceased operations at its mine until it resumed on a non-union basis in June, 1906. For instance, the plaintiff complains of what happened during the strike which occurred when the mine employed union labor. Evidence was also introduced to show why the plaintiff did not 891 continue to operate its mine on a union basis. This evidence shows that the real difference at that time was as to the price or scale to be paid for run of mine coal. While this evidence tends to show why the plaintiff declined to operate its mine on a union basis, it cannot have any material bearing upon the issues raised by the pleadings in this cause, and is, therefore, as to matters now in controversy, a closed incident.

Each party was at arms' length from that time on, and the refusal on the part of the plaintiff to continue the employment of union labor, had the effect of severing the relations that had theretofore existed between the plaintiff and the defendants. Therefore evidence tending to show that prior to that date the defendants were engaged in a combination or conspiracy, and by intimidation, violence, and coercion were trying to prevent the plaintiff from operating its mine, would be incompetent. In other words, even though it appears from the evidence in question that the conduct of the defendants was reprehensible in the highest degree at the time that the mine was being run on a union basis, we conceive of no possible theory upon which such evidence would be competent as affecting the conduct of the defendants in this instance, inasmuch as the evidence fails to show that after the mine began to be operated on a non-union basis that they united and conspired to use violence, intimidation, and coercion to prevent the plaintiff from operating its mine. In other words this record clearly shows that the plaintiff for the avowed purpose of protecting its interests adopted a policy by which its mines were to be operated on a non-union basis. At the time of the adoption of this policy by the plaintiff, the negotiations between plaintiff and defendants ceased, therefore the question now presented is: Have not the defendants the right as an organization to use all means within their power to organize miners into unions, provided, that in so doing, no unlawful methods are employed?

The court below among other things expressed the view that the United Mine Workers of America constituted a combination or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, under what is known as the Sherman Anti-Trust Law, 26 Stat. L. 209.

892 We do not deem it necessary to discuss this proposition at any great length. In the first place there is nothing in the pleadings to raise the question as to whether the United Mine Workers of America are liable under the statute in question, and any evidence that may have been introduced bearing upon this point was therefore immaterial and should have been rejected. There is another reason why we think that this question cannot under any view of the case arise in this controversy, to-wit, we do not understand that a private person can question the validity of a combination or conspiracy under the Sherman Anti-Trust Law for the purpose of having the same declared to be unlawful. The scope of this act is disclosed in the case of National Fire Proof Company vs. Mason Builders' Association, 169 Fed., 259, in which the court said:

"But the complainant asserts that the agreement in this case is positively unlawful and not merely negatively invalid—that it contravenes both national and State statutes against combinations, and thus does give rights of action to injured persons. With respect to the Fed. Statute, it is not obvious in what way a trade agreement between builders and bricklayers, relating to their work in the State of New York, can be said to directly affect interstate commerce; but the consideration of this question is not necessary because a person injured by a violation of the federal act cannot sue for an injunction under it. The injunctive remedy is available to the government only. An individual can only sue for threefold damages." Greer vs. Stoller (C. C.), 77 Fed., 2. Also the case of Minnesota vs. Northern Securities Co., 194 U. S. 48, is to the same effect.

The court below also reached the conclusion that the defendants have caused and are attempting to cause the non-union members employed by the plaintiff to break a contract which it has with the non-union operators. The contract in question is in the following language:

"I am employed by and work for the Hitchman Coal and Coke Company with the express understanding that I am not a member of the United Mine Workers of America, and will not become so while an employe of the Hitchman Coal and Coke Company; that 893 the Hitchman Coal and Coke Company is run non-union and agrees with me that it will run non-union while I am in its employ. If at any time while I am employed by the Hitchman Coal and Coke Company I want to become connected with the United Mine Workers of America, or any affiliated organization, I agree to withdraw from the employment of said company, and agree that while I am in the employ of that company that I will not make any effort amongst its employes to bring about the unionizing of that mine against the company's wish. I have either read the above or heard the same read."

It will be observed that by the terms of the contract that either of the parties thereto may at will terminate the same, and while it is provided that so long as the employe continues to work for the plaintiff he shall not join this organization, nevertheless, there is nothing in the contract which requires such employes to work for any fixed or definite period. If at any time after employment any of them should decide to join the defendant organization, the plaintiff could not under the contract recover damages for a breach of the same. In other words, the employes under this contract may, if they deem proper, at any moment join a labor union, and the only penalty provided therefor is that they cannot secure further employment from the plaintiff. Therefore, under this contract, if the non-union men, or any of them, should see fit to join the United Mine Workers of America on account of lawful and persuasive methods on the part of the defendants, and as a result of such action on their part were to be discharged by the plaintiff, it could not maintain an action against them on account of such conduct on their part. Such being the case it would be unreasonable to hold that the action of the defendants would render the United Mine Workers of America liable in damages to the plaintiff because they had employed lawful methods to induce the non-union miners to become members of their organization.

Under these circumstances we fail to see how this contract can be taken as a basis for restraining the defendants from using lawful methods for the purpose of inducing the parties to the contract to join the organization.

This is an age of co-operation through organization. In fact organization is the only means by which united effort can 894 be secured in any branch of human endeavor. The doctors, dentists, school-teachers, wholesale and retail merchants, bankers and manufacturers, and in fact every branch of industry in this country, are organized for the purpose of the mutual protection of the respective parties interested. Such being the case, it is just as essential, and perhaps more important, that the laboring people should organize for their advancement and protection, than it is for any of the vocations we have mentioned.

While labor and capital are vitally interested in the proper solution of these questions, it should be remembered that the public is likewise interested, and in some instances affected to a greater extent than either labor or capital on account of the disputes and law suits growing out of these matters. Therefore, it may be properly said that these questions have a bearing upon the welfare of a large percentage of our people, and this is especially true as respect- the coal industry. For instance, the suspension of the operation of coal mining in this country would in all probability result in a coal famine, which would, in a large measure, embarrass the manufacturers, to say nothing of the effect it would have upon the individual consumer, and all reasonable means should be employed to avert such a disaster. Therefore we deem it our duty to define the rights of the parties to this controversy, in so far as we may under the facts of this case, so as to set at rest as many as possible of the vexatious questions that are a source of irritation, as well as productive of much litigation.

In the first place, it should be understood once and for all that so long as capital employs legitimate means for the protection of property rights, that it is to be accorded the protection of the law, but this does not mean that capital may, by improper methods, form combinations for the purpose of preventing labor from organizing for mutual protection. Likewise, it should be definitely understood that the laboring men have the right to use peaceable and lawful methods to unite their forces in order to improve their condition as respects their ability to earn a decent living; give their children moral and intellectual training; and secure the enactment of legislation re-895 quiring mine owners to adopt such methods as may be necessary to keep their mines in a sanitary condition, and, above all, to adopt methods to minimize, as much as possible, the occurrence of the awful catastrophes by which so many human lives have been lost. It should be understood that when a controversy arises between labor and capital that the use of dynamite or any other unlawful methods on the part of the representatives of labor, whereby property and human lives are destroyed, is not to be tolerated by the courts.

The relative rights of the parties are entitled to equal consideration, and we feel sure that when such controversies arise that they will be dealt with in the same spirit that actuates the courts in adjusting the differences between individuals, wherein questions are involved affecting the ordinary transactions of life.

Until it is provided by state and national legislation that labor disputes shall be settled by arbitration, it will be the duty of the courts to determine questions of this character, when a proper case is presented. Under the law as it now exists, when property or personal rights are involved, the courts alone can furnish adequate relief. However, while this is true, we think that care and caution should be exercised in the issuance of injunctions of this character.

We are inclined to the belief that in some instances a reasonable delay in the issuance of the writ would have a tendency to bring about a settlement between the parties by which the rights of both could be amply protected, and thus avoid the expense incident to litigation, to say nothing about the injury sustained by the employer as well as the employe, occasioned by the suspension of operations.

In no instance should a union be restrained from using lawful and peaceable methods for the purpose of maintaining its organization, but while this is true, the court should restrain those who by violence, coercion, and intimidation seek to deprive the mine owner of the right to use his property as he may see fit.

We have carefully considered the cases relied upon by the plaintiff, but are of opinion that they do not apply to case at bar. For 896 the reasons stated, the decree of the court below is reversed, and the cause remanded with instructions to dismiss the bill at plaintiff's costs.

Assignment of Errors.

In Equity.

No. 1220.

JOHN MITCHELL, Individually; T. L. LEWIS, Individually; W. B. WILSON, Individually, et al., Appellants, vs.
HITCHMAN COAL AND COKE COMPANY, a Corporation, Appellee.

Assignment of Errors.

Now comes the defendant in the above entitled cause and files the following assignment of errors upon which it will rely upon the prosecution of its appeal in the above entitled cause, from the decree made by this Honorable Court on the 28th day of May, 1914.

I.

That the said Circuit Court of Appeals erred in rendering its said decree of the 28th day of May, 1914, which concludes with this following statement: "For the reasons stated, the decree of this court below is reversed, and the cause remanded with instructions to dismiss the bill at plaintiff's costs."

II.

That said Circuit Court of Appeals erred in reversing the final decree rendered by the said District Court of the United States for the Northern District of West Virginia on December 23, 1912 (and entered January 18, 1913), perpetuating the injunction theretofore granted, and denying the motion of these appellants (then defendants) to dissolve the temporary injunction and to dismiss the bill.

III.

That said Circuit Court of Appeals erred in reversing that part of the decree of said District Court in which it was held that the said United Mine Workers of America and its subordinate associations or branches constitute an unlawful organization, said Circuit Court of Appeals declaring that, "A consideration of the purposes of this organization as set forth in its constitution impels us to the conclusion that there is nothing contained therein to justify the contention that its purposes are unlawful."

IV.

That said Circuit Court of Appeals erred in reaching the following conclusion:

"As we have already stated, we are of the opinion that even if at common law as originally adopted by the State of West Virginia, this organization was unlawful, it does not follow that that part of the common law is now applicable in that State, owing to the changed conditions to which we have referred * * * we are of opinion that the court below erred in declaring these organizations to be unlawful at common law."

V.

That said Circuit Court of Appeals erred in reversing the following conclusions reached by said District Court: "I further conclude (said the District Court) that this Union, in pursuit of its unlawful purposes to secure control and the monopoly of mine labor, and to restrain, suppress, if not destroy the coal mining industry of West Virginia in the interest of their co-conspirators, rival operators and producers of Ohio, West Pennsylvania, Illinois and 902 Indiana, competitive fields, have sought and still seek to compel the plaintiff, the Hitchman Coal and Coke Company, to submit to contractual relations with it as an organization, relating to the employment of labor and production contrary to the will and wish of said company; that its officers, in pursuance of such unlawful efforts to monopolize labor and restrain trade, and with knowledge of the express contracts existing between this plaintiff and its employees, have unlawfully sought to cause the breach of the said contracts on the part of its employees." In reversing those conclusions, reached by said District Court, the said Circuit Court of Appeals erred in declaring that "As we have already stated, the evidence fails to show that any unlawful methods were resorted to by these defendants in this instance. Therefore, the court erred in holding the organization to be unlawful upon the theory that it was guilty of a conspiracy."

VI.

That said Circuit Court of Appeals erred in reversing those parts of said final decree of said District Court in which the appellants herein (then defendants) were "perpetually enjoined and restrained from interfering and from combining, conspiring, or attempting to interfere with the employees of the plaintiff for the purpose of unionizing plaintiff's mine without plaintiff's consent," by all of the various means set forth particularly and in detail in said final decree of said District Court.

VII.

That said Circuit Court of Appeals erred in refusing to perpetuate said injunction, decreed in said District Court, by reversing said decree and ordering the dismissal of said bill, because it thereby deprived the said Hitchman Coal and Coke Company of its contractual and property rights, as described in its bill of complaint, and as guaranteed to it by the Fifth Amendment, and by the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

VIII.

The said Circuit Court of Appeals erred in reversing that part of the decree of said District Court in which it was held that the United Mine Workers of America constitute a combination or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce, under what is known as the Sherman Anti-Trust Law. Before discussing the contested construction of that Federal statute, as involved in this case, said Circuit Court of Appeals said: "The court below among other things expressed the view that the United Mine Workers of America constituted a combination or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce among the several states, or with foreign nations, under what is known as the Sherman Anti-Trust Law, 26 Stat. L. 209." Said Circuit Court of Appeals erred in reversing the construction put by said District Court upon said Sherman Anti-Trust Law, greatly to the detriment of the contractual and property rights of said Hitchman Coal and Coke Company, as set forth in the bill of complaint and as guaranteed to it by the Constitution and statute laws of the United States.

Wherefore the appellant, the said Hitchman Coal and Coke Company, prays that said decree of said Circuit Court of Appeals be reversed, and that it enter such decree as may be directed by the Supreme Court of the United States.

OCTOBER TERM, 1914.

No. 617.

HITCHMAN COAL AND COKE COMPANY, A CORPORATION, Petitioner,

v.

JOHN MITCHELL, individually; T. L. LEWIS, individually; W. B. WILSON, individually, et al., Respondents.

PETITION AND MOTION FOR CERTIORARI AND BRIEF IN SUPPORT THEREOF.

The petition of Hitchman Coal and Coke Company, for a writ of certiorari to be directed to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, to bring before this Honorable Court the case No. 1220, there pending, entitled, John Mitchell et al., appellants, v. Hitchman Coal and Coke Company, appellee. In Equity, No. 1220.

To the Honorable the Chief Justice and Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States.

1. Your petitioner, Hitchman Coal and Coke Company respectfully represents that in the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of West Virginia, the above named petitioner on October 24, 1907, commenced a suit in equity for injunctive relief against the above named respondents, averring among other things, the following:

> "Your orator further says that unless enjoined by this Court, the said defendants acting individually and agreeing, confederating, combining and forming themselves into a conspiracy under the name of the United Mine Workers of America as aforesaid, will, in pursuance of their unlawful purposes and designs, by enticement, persuasion or coercion, in one form or the other, bring about the shutting down of your orator's mine and the ultimate destruction of its business, and will without the consent and against the will of your orator compel your orator to recognize said defendants and said associations in the further transaction of its legitimate business in mining and shipping coal, and will compel your orator to contract with its employees through the said defendants as officers of the said associations under such rules and regulations made and enforced by said associations and by said defendant officers as will enable the Union to dictate the persons whom your orator shall employ and those whom your orator shall discharge, the wages your orator shall pay, and further will compel your orator to agree that each of its future employees as members of the said United Mine Workers of America shall owe and yield to said Union an allegiance which shall in all things be paramount to that which said employees would owe to your orator, and that they will thus take charge of, dictate the management of, and virtually control, your orator's business, and thereby perpetrate acts of oppression and wrong upon your orator which distinctly violate your orator's contractual, common law, statutory and constitutional rights as a citizen of the State of West Virginia."

After protracted litigation a final decree was rendered in said cause on January 18, 1913, in favor of petitioner, awarding to it a perpetual injunction against the United Mine Workers of America. In the course of his opinion District Judge Dayton said:

> "The final question arises how is this plaintiff, the Hitchman Coal and Coke Company, affected and what right has it to complain and appeal for injunctive relief? The evidence establishes these facts:"

After stating the facts thus established, the Court said:

> "I conclude, therefore, that this organization, known as the United Mine Workers of America, is an unlawful one because, (a) of its principles as set forth in its constitutions, obligation for membership and rules which (1) require its members to surrender their individual freedom of action, (2) seeks to require, in practical effect, all mine workers to become members of it whether desirous of doing so or not, (3) seeks to control, and restrict, if not destroy, the right of the mine owner to contract with its employees independent of the organization, (4) to exclude his right to employ non-union labor if he desires, (5) to limit his right to discharge, in the absence of contract, whom he pleases, when he pleases and for any cause or reason that to him seems proper, (6) assumes the right on its part, by and through its officers, to control the mine owner's business by shutting down his mine, calling out his men upon indefinite strike in obedience to their obligation to the Union, whether the men desire to quit work or not, whenever the Union's officers deem it to be for the best interests of the Union, regardless of the rights and interests of the mine owner, and regardless of his direct loss and damages and such indirect loss and damage as may be incurred by him by reason of the resultant violation of contracts by him with others. Adair v. United States, 208 U. S. 161, 52 L. ed. 436. I further conclude that it is an unlawful organization because, (b) of its procedure and practices in that,

(1) it seeks to create a monopoly of mine labor such as to enable it, as an organization, to control the coal mining business of the country, and (2) has by express contract joined in a combination and conspiracy with a body of rival operators, resident in other states, to control, restrain and, to an extent at least, destroy the coal trade of the State of West Virginia. It has spent fourteen years time and hundreds of thousands of dollars in effort to accomplish this unlawful purpose. The rules of law relating to the responsibility of individual members concerned in such combination and conspiracy are plain and well defined. Great latitude in establishing conspiracy by the admission of circumstantial evidence is allowed, circumstances tending in slight degree to a determination of the truth are allowed to be proved. Clune v. United States, 159 U. S. 590, 40 L. ed. 269. The acts and declarations of co-conspirators in execution of a conspiracy are evidence against others of their number. Id. * * *

"In Loewe v. Lawlor, 208 U. S. 274, it was held that the Sherman Anti-trust Act 'prohibits any combination whatever to secure action which essentially obstructs the free flow of commerce between the States, or restricts, in that regard, the liberty of a trader to engage in business;' and this includes 'restraints of trade aimed at compelling third parties and strangers involuntarily not to engage in the course of interstate trade except on conditions that the combination imposes' and that it 'makes no distinction between classes. Organizations of farmers and laborers were not exempted from its operation, notwithstanding the efforts which the records of Congress show were made in that direction' and that 'a combination of labor organizations and the members thereof, to compel a manufacturer whose goods are almost entirely sold in other states, to unionize his shops and on his refusal so to do to boycott his goods and prevent their sale in states other than his own until such time as the resulting damage forces

"I further conclude that this Union, in pursuit of its unlawful purposes to secure control and the monopoly of mine labor, and to restrain, suppress, if not destroy, the coal mining industry of West Virginia in the interest of their co-conspirators, rival operators and producers in Ohio, Western Pennsylvania, Illinois and Indiana competitive fields, have sought and still seek to compel the plaintiff, the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company, to submit to contractual relations with it as an organization, relating to the employment of labor and production contrary to the will and wish of said company; that its officers, in pursuance of such unlawful effort to monopolize labor and restrain trade, and with knowledge of the express contracts existing between this plaintiff and its employees, have unlawfully sought to cause the breach of the said contracts on the part of its said employees."

In the course of its opinion the Court also said:

"As regards the second aspect, the relation of these organizations to the general public as consumers of the products of capital and labor it must be admitted that, in the absence of special legislation such as that of England, (of doubtful constitutionality at least in this country under the written constitutions, Federal and State, thereof) it is just as unlawful for labor to combine to form a trust or monopoly as it is for capital to do so. The same rule of common law governs the one as the other and the Act of Congress, known as the Sherman Anti-Trust Law, I conceive to be simply declaratory of this principle. The latest construction of this act by the Supreme Court set forth in the Standard Oil Company v. United States, 221 U. S. 1 and United States v. American Tobacco Company, 221 U. S. 106 is that 'it prohibits all contracts and combination which amount to an unreasonable or undue restraint of trade in interstate commerce.' By the English authorities, I have hereinbefore cited, it will be perceived that the same doctrine of the 'unreasonable' restraint of trade has been applied there as against these labor organizations."

After citing the case of Adair v. United States, 208 U. S. 161, the Court said:

"In this latter case the Supreme Court holds such a provision 'to be an invasion of personal liberty, as well as of the right of property, guaranteed by the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.' This leaves the Act of June 29, 1886, Ch. 567, 24 Stat. L. 86, 7 Fed. Stat. Ann. 334, entitled 'An Act to legalize the incorporation of National Trade Unions,' as our only Federal law in amendment or modification of the Common Law upon the subject of Trade Unions. * * *

"Further citation of authority would seem to be unnecessary to establish the proposition that under Federal legislation and that of West Virginia the common law is in full force and that the several propositions I have set forth are the principles of law to govern in the determination of this case. * * * It may be unfortunate for those states that nature has favored West Virginia, Kentucky and other southern states by giving them better coal and less expensive mining conditions, but this does not warrant the operators and miners there to combine and confederate for the purpose of depriving the consuming public of the right to purchase the better coal at the lower cost, if desired. Such a combination is clearly a common law conspiracy, too far reaching to be reasonable, in restraint of trade, as well, in my judgment, a direct violation of the Sherman Anti-Trust law. It is further in my judgment, a combination or conspiracy against the rights of the many thousands of non-union miners in West Virginia who are entitled to enjoy the advantage in their labor that nature has given them.

> "* * * In all these particulars these provisions violate the law guaranteeing, under our free government, the rights of both the labor and capital involved and, further, the rights of the public consuming the product of such labor and capital. But still further and what manifestly is of far more vital importance, under the power so assumed by this close and compact organization, and by reason of these obligations and rules enforced by it upon its members, it is more than probable, that if allowed to unionize and control the mining operations in West Virginia, it will be entirely able to fulfill its express contract of 1898 with its co-conspirators, the operators of Ohio, Western Pennsylvania, Indiana and Illinois and 'protect' them from the competition of West Virginia coals, restore to them their lost markets and practically destroy the coal mining industry of this state to accomplish which, the Union has admittedly already spent hundreds of thousands of dollars and sacrificed human life, as yet to no avail."

2. From said final decree rendered in favor of this petitioner on January 18, 1913, by said District Court, an appeal was taken to the said Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, and was there argued on February 12, 1914, before Circuit Judges Pritchard, Knapp and Woods, the first named delivering the opinion and judgment of the Court on May 28, 1914, reversing the decree of the Court below, and remanding the cause with instructions to dismiss the bill at plaintiff's costs. In the course of its opinion the Circuit Court of Appeals, speaking through Judge Pritchard, said:

> "We fully appreciate the important bearing the questions here presented have upon the welfare of the mine owners, as well as the laboring men, and are not unmindful of the delicate issues raised by the pleadings and proof in this cause.

"That it is advisable to secure a just and fair solution of the labor problem by which equal protection to capital and labor may be secured is undoubtedly the wish of every patriotic citizen regardless of his station in life. That one who toils for his living is justified in employing all lawful methods for the preservation of his right as an American citizen to secure fair remuneration for his services, is established by the Federal and the State Courts. That such a person also has the right to join with others similarly situated, in order to promote their welfare as a class, is also established as the law of this country. But while this is so, it is equally well settled that the mine owner is entitled to the full protection of the law in the conduct of his business and the enjoyment of his property. * * *

"The most important and far-reaching question is raised by the assignment of error wherein it is insisted that the Court below erred in holding that the United Mine Workers of America and its subordinate branches constitute an unlawful organization under the constitution, the common law, and the statutory law of the State of West Virginia.

"The learned judge who granted the injunction in this instance filed a very able and exhaustive opinion (202 Fed., 510), in which it is held, among other things, that the United Mine Workers of America is an unlawful combination at common law, which he insists is still in full force in that State, and in support thereof cites many English cases. * * *

"The Court below in its opinion referred to a number of provisions contained in the constitution and rules of this organization which in its judgment rendered the same unlawful, the first being that a member is required to promise that he will cease to work whenever called upon to do so by the organization.

"A careful examination of this provision fails to show on its face anything unlawful, while on the other hand common experience teaches us that a rule of this character is essential for the preservation of labor organizations. * * *

"The court below was also of the opinion that under the rules of the organization a member could be held as a slave, and thus prevented from exercising his own free will. We fail to find any provision preventing one from ceasing to work at any time he may desire, and if he should do so, he would no longer be a member of the organization. One could also cease to be a member of the union by failing to pay his dues. Under these circumstances there is no possibility of one's being held as a member of the union contrary to his wishes.

"The court below was further of the opinion that the union has the power to cause miners to become members thereof. We fail to find anything in the rules to justify the assumption that the union has an arbitrary power, by violence, intimidation or otherwise, to compel one to become a member of the organization. While it is alleged in the bill that the United Mine Workers of America is a secret, voluntary organization, this allegation is not only denied by the answer, but is shown to be incorrect by at least three witnesses, who testified that they were familiar with the organization and its workings, that it is not a secret organization in the ordinary acceptation of the term. * * *

"Another ground relied upon by the court below is that the organization assumes the right through its officers, (1) to control the employer's business, (2) to shut down his mine by calling out men in obedience to their obligation whenever it is deemed to be to the interest of the union, regardless of the employer's interest, or the effect that such act may have upon him as regards loss, damage or necessary violation, on account thereof, of his existing contracts with others. * * *

"It is also insisted by the court below that under these rules the operator has no right to employ non-union men even if he should desire to do so.

"If the United Mine Workers of America in pursuance of this rule should resort to coercion, threats, intimidation or violence for the purpose of preventing the mine owner from employing non-union men, such conduct would be unlawful, and the courts would promptly restrain any one who might be a party to such transaction. Indeed, it would be unlawful for an individual to undertake, by coercion, intimidation or threats to prevent a mine owner from exercising his own free will as to the employment of non-union laborers, or as to any other thing which he might deem necessary to be done in order to protect his property rights. * * *

"In view of what we have said as to the status of these organizations at common law, and the further fact that there is an implied, if not direct recognition of labor unions by statute in West Virginia, and there being no enactment declaring the same to be unlawful, we are of the opinion that the court below erred in declaring these organizations to be unlawful at common law. * * *

"The court below among other things expressed the view that the United Mine Workers of America constituted a combination or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, under what is known as the Sherman Anti-Trust Law, 26 Stat. L. 209.

"We do not deem it necessary to discuss this proposition at any great length. In the first place there is nothing in the pleadings to raise the question as to whether the United Mine Workers of America are liable under the statute in question, and any evidence that may have been introduced bearing upon this point was therefore immaterial and should have been rejected. There is another reason why we think that this question cannot under any view of the case arise in this controversy, to wit, we do not understand that a private person can question the validity of a combination or conspiracy under the Sherman Anti-Trust Law for the purpose of having the same declared to be unlawful. * * *

"The court below also reached the conclusion that the defendants have caused and are attempting to cause the non-union members employed by the plaintiff to break a contract which it has with the non-union operators. The contract in question is in the following language:

"'I am employed by and work for the Hitchman Coal and Coke Company with the express understanding that I am not a member of the United Mine Workers of America, and will not become so while an employe of the Hitchman Coal and Coke Company; that the Hitchman Coal and Coke Company is run non-union and agrees with me that it will run non-union while I am in its employ. If at any time while I am employed by the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company I want to become connected with the United Mine Workers of America, or any affiliated organization, I agree to withdraw from the employment of said company, and agree that while I am in the employ of that company that I will not make any efforts amongst its employes to bring about the unionizing of that mine against the company's wish. I have either read the above or heard the same read. * * * Under these circumstances we fail to see how this contract can be taken as a basis for restraining the defendants from using lawful methods for the purpose of inducing the parties to the contract to join the organization.' * * *

"While labor and capital are vitally interested in the proper solution of these questions, it should be remembered that the public is likewise interested, and in some instances affected to a greater extent than either labor or capital on account of the disputes and law suits growing out of these matters. Therefore, it may be properly said that these questions have a bearing upon the welfare of a large percentage of our people, and this is especially true as respect the coal industry. For instance, the suspension of the operation of coal mining in this country would in all probability result in a coal famine, which would, in a large measure, embarrass the manufacturers, to say nothing of the effect it would have upon the individual consumer, and all reasonable means should be employed to avert such a disaster. Therefore we deem it our duty to define the rights of the parties to this controversy, in so far as we may under the facts of this case, so as to set at rest as many as possible of the vexatious questions that are a source of irritation, as well as productive of much litigation."

3. Petitioner further avers that it thus clearly appears from an inspection of the opinions and judgments rendered in this case, first by said District Court in favor of petitioner, and second, by the Circuit Court of Appeals against petitioner, that "the plaintiff's declaration claimed that the controversy turned on a construction of the laws of the United States, and both courts below dealt with the case on that assumption." Fla. Cent. & P. R. Co. v. Bell, 176 U. S. 321. Inherent in this case from the beginning and patent upon the face of the bill filed by petitioner, is the fact, entirely apart from the question of diversity of citizenship, that the contractual and property rights sought to be protected by said bill depend upon the terms of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution of the United States, and upon the terms of the Sherman Anti-Trust Law, 26 Stat. L. 209. As a citizen of West Virginia petitioner is necessarily a citizen of the United States, and as such it is entitled to the full protection of its constitution and laws. Slaughter House Cases, 16 Wall. 36. District Judge Dayton's opinion deals, from beginning to end, with the contractual and property rights of petitioner, as protected by the terms of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments and by the Sherman Anti-Trust Law. On page 34 of his opinion [Record, p. 783] he refers directly to the case of Adair v. United States, 208 U. S. 161, with the observation that "In this latter case the Supreme Court holds such a provision 'to be an invasion of personal liberty as well as of the right of property guaranteed by the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States;' " and on page 60 [Record, p. 806] he says: "Such a combination is clearly a common law conspiracy, too far-reaching to be reasonable, in restraint of trade, as well, in my judgment, a direct violation of the Sherman Anti-Trust Law." The opinion and judgment of the Circuit Court of Appeals consists of a difference of view as to the construction and application of Federal law, constitutional and statutory, as applied by District Judge Dayton to the facts of this case.

4. Your petitioner further avers that by reason of the foregoing the said decree of the Circuit Court of Appeals is not final, it having been settled by this court that a "judgment of the Circuit Court of Appeals cannot be held final on the ground that the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court was dependent entirely upon diverse citizenship, where the plaintiff's declaration claimed that the controversy turned on a construction of the laws of the United States, and both courts below dealt with the case on that assumption." Thus advised by counsel petitioner, after the adjournment of said Circuit Court of Appeals, presented a petition to Circuit Judge Pritchard for an appeal upon the ground that the decree of said court made against petitioner on May 28, 1914, is not final, for the reason that, entirely apart from the question of diverse citizenship, the merits of this case depend upon a construction of the laws of the United States, constitutional and statutory, and that both courts below dealt with the case on that assumption. After deliberate examination Judge Pritchard concluded that the contention of petitioner in that regard was well taken, recognizing the fact at the same time that there are grave and far-reaching questions of federal law involved in this record which have not so far been passed upon by this court. Acting under that conviction Judge Pritchard, on August 15, 1914, "ordered that an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States from the decree heretofore filed and entered herein, be, and the same is hereby allowed, and that a certified transcript of the record, testimony, exhibits, stipulations, and all proceedings be forthwith transmitted to said Supreme Court of the United States." Petitioner further avers that such order has been fully complied with; that such certified transcript has been duly filed; and such appeal now stands as No. 617 on the docket of this court.

5. Your petitioner further avers that it appears from the foregoing that while by reason of diversity of citizenship the said District Court and the said Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit unquestionably had jurisdiction of this cause, petitioner has always contended and contends now that the jurisdiction of the United States Courts is not dependent entirely upon the fact that the opposing parties to this suit are citizens of different States, but upon the further fact that this case is one arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States. And while petitioner and its counsel are convinced that, for that reason, the said decision and decree of said Circuit Court of Appeals is not final, yet, as the interests involved are so great, and the federal questions involved so vital and far-reaching, your petitioner has determined as a matter of prudence to apply to this court, according to a well established practice, for a review of said final decree by certiorari, as provided in section 240 of chapter 231 of vol. 30 of the Statutes at Large. As a predicate for that application petitioner hereby submits to the court the following statement of the case as presented in the courts below:

6. This suit is against John Mitchell, Thomas L. Lewis and others, individually, and as officers and representatives of the United Mine Workers of America. The bill was filed October 24, 1907, in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of West Virginia, and upon its showing a restraining order was issued that day. On May 26, 1908, a temporary injunction was granted. Subsequently, the served defendants sought to have the terms of the injunction so modified as to permit the United Mine Workers to go ahead and by persuasion, or by other means, not including, however, force, fraud, violence, intimidation or coercion, unionize plaintiff's men, and consequently its mine. This motion was overruled, and subsequently the served defendants appealed to the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, which Court, on March 11, 1910, on motion of plaintiff, dismissed the appeal for want of jurisdiction, and remanded the cause to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of West Virginia for further proceedings. 100 C. C. A. 137, 176 F. 549. All of the answers theretofore filed were afterwards in that Court withdrawn by leave of that Court, but upon the insistence of plaintiff were not allowed to be taken from the file. New answers were filed still later, to which plaintiff replied generally, and on issue being joined a stipulation was entered into November 5, 1910, under which by order of that Court all evidence not introduced by orders entered that day was directed to be introduced orally to that Court in its presence instead of by means of depositions taken and filed in the cause, and fixing December 19, 1910, at 10 o'clock A. M., at the Court House in Philippi, as the time and place when and where the hearing of such evidence should commence. The taking of this evidence covered December 19, 20, 21, 22 and 23, 1910, and March 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 20, 21, 22 and 23, 1911, and at the conclusion thereof plaintiff moved that the injunction of May 26, 1908, be made permanent, while the served defendants moved that it be dissolved and that plaintiff's bill be dismissed.

Following the conclusion of the trial in that Court, the case was argued orally, and by briefs filed, and that Court having rendered its decision thereon and filed its written opinion December 23, 1912, a final decree was entered in that Court on January 18, 1913, and an appeal was then taken by the defendants from that Court to the Circuit Court of Appeals.

Passing to the proof it is safe to say that the material allegations of the bill filed in the lower Court have been abundantly sustained. And it is also safe to say that no controversy arose in that Court over the material facts. So the issue here is rather one of law on those facts.

Therefore, before applying the law which plaintiff claims should apply to the facts let us see what those facts are.

The bill is comprehensive and charges that the United Mine Workers of America are a monopolistic combination designed to bring into its membership and under its control all men who work in or around the coal mines of the United States, and that in pursuit of its unlawful purposes it has sought and still seeks to compel plaintiff to run a union mine, or failing that, then to quit business.

The evidence in the case is voluminous. In part it consists of the oral testimony before the Court, taken stenographically and duly transcribed, a book containing the Constitution of the International Union, United Mine Workers of America, Revision 1907, a book containing the Constitution of District No. 6 United Mine Workers of America, with all amendments to January 12, 1907, a book containing the Preamble and Manual and Constitution United Mine Workers of America, Sub-District 5 of District 6, Revision 1907, a book containing the Proceedings of the Eighteenth Annual Convention of the United Mine Workers of America held in the City of Indianapolis, Indiana, January fifteenth to twenty-second inclusive, Nineteen seven, a book containing the Proceedings of the Ninth Annual Convention of Sub-District 5 of District 6 United Mine Workers of America, held at Wheeling, West Virginia, March 14, 15, 16, 18, and 19, 1907, a small pamphlet entitled "United Mine Workers of America, District No. 6, Ohio, issued by the authority of the executive board of District No. 6, Ohio Miners, United Mine Workers of America, G. W. Savage, Secretary-Treasurer, for scale year, April 1, 1908, to March 31, 1910," a book entitled "Interstate Conventions, 1906, Joint Conference Coal Miners and Operators of Western Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana and Illinois, Indianapolis, Indiana, January 25th to February 2nd, and March 20th to 29th, 1906," a book entitled "Joint Convention of the Illinois Coal Operators Association and the United Mine Workers of America, District Twelve, held at Springfield, Illinois, May 17 to June 1, 1906," a book entitled "Interstate Convention of 1908. Joint Conference of Coal Miners and Operators of Western Pennsylvania, Ohio and Indiana, held at Toledo, Ohio, April 14–17, 1908," a book entitled "Proceedings of Joint Conference of Coal Operators and Coal Miners of Western Pennsylvania, Ohio and Indiana, Cincinnati, March 8–29, 1910," a pamphlet containing the Report of President T. L. Lewis, Twentieth Annual Convention of United Mine Workers of America, a pamphlet containing the Report of Vice-President John T. White, Twentieth Annual Convention of United Mine Workers of America, Indianapolis, Indiana, January 19, 1909, a pamphlet containing the Report of Secretary W. D. Ryan, Twentieth Annual Convention of United Mine Workers of America, a pamphlet entitled "Official Mining Scale of Association of Pittsburg Vein Operators for their Mines in Belmont, Harrison and Jefferson Counties, Ohio, and the United Mine Workers of America, and containing the "Conditions of the Columbus Day Wage Scale 1898," in effect April 1, 1906, and ending March 31, 1908, a book entitled "Official Mining Scale of Association of Pittsburg Vein Operators for their Mines in Belmont, Harrison and Jefferson Counties, Ohio, and the United Mine Workers of America. Adopted May 19, 1910. In effect April 1, 1910, and ending March 31, 1912," and the Report of President Lewis to the Convention of United Mine Workers of America held at Indianapolis, Indiana, January, 1911, as it appears in the United Mine Workers' Journal of January 19, 1911.

The defense objected to the admission of all of this material as evidence, but the objection was overruled, and the same and other objections reduced to writing were subsequently in the lower Court filed in the cause, considered by that Court, and by that Court overruled.

The evidence covers an equivalent of more than 8,000 pages made up of the pleadings, proceedings, oral evidence taken on the trial, and documentary matter of one kind or another introduced in evidence. The printed record contains only a portion of the actual record. It contains the oral testimony reduced in the main to narrative form. But as shown by the order of the Circuit Court of Appeals [Record p. 904] allowing an appeal to this Court certain original papers which were sent to that Court by the District Court have been sent by the Circuit Court of Appeals to this Court and supplement the printed record.

Facts Proved.

The existence of the United Mine Workers of America as an organization dates from January, 1890. As a body they were initially made up of several others which had theretofore been warring with each other, and had, of course, been unsuccessful in their special field of endeavor. And the founders had in mind the creation of a body which would be national in character and national in power. In doing this a far-sighted policy was pursued. The organization had its National Constitution, which in later years was changed in name to International owing to the inclusion of mine workers outside of the United States. It had also its District Constitutions and its Sub-District Constitutions. It has those today. The Sub-Districts have their Locals, which are the equivalent of Lodges. In representation these Locals make up a Sub-District Convention. District Conventions are made up of delegates from Locals in the given District. And the National Convention is made up of delegates from the Locals in all the Districts. Certain power is given to each body to legislate. And each body has a President, a Vice-President and a Secretary-Treasurer. National or International matters are disposed of by the National Conventions, District by District Conventions, and Sub-District by Sub-District Conventions. The defense introduced testimony that the organization of the United Mine Workers of America was patterned after the United States Government, and after the State, County and Township governments. And theoretically that seems to some extent to be borne out by an examination of literature of the Union. For it appears that Locals have and exercise all the powers they wish which have not been in express terms delegated to the Sub-Districts, Sub-Districts all not delegated to the Districts, and Districts all not delegated to the National or International Union. But the order is inverse; the analogy not complete. And from this attempt to apply to a labor union governmental principles of a political nature there has grown a National body, the rules and regulations of which, taken together in their International, District, Sub-District and Local features, are a chaotic mass, some lawful and some unlawful, but pregnant with unmeasured and unmeasurable abuse of unlimited and unregulated power.

The United Mine Workers of America are a secret body, and no part of it, International, District, Sub-District or Local, is incorporated.

Its purposes are made known to mine workers through men who are sent out by the National President as organizers. These organizers may do their work secretly or openly, but in practice they are governed by the rule that the end justifies the means. Upon a Local being organized, one-half or thereabouts of the Charter Fee is paid to the organizer.

Starting with a membership in 1890 of about 20,000 there were less than 10,000 members in 1896. This is said to have been due to the unsuccessful National strike of 1894. The work of organizing was then pushed, and in 1897, with a membership of about 40,000, another National strike was declared. That strike was unsuccessful too, and as a result the membership fell to 32,000 in 1898. It was then that the leaders recognized the futility of their efforts and came to a realization of the fact that unless some other methods were adopted the United Mine Workers of America would dwindle away as had been the case with other labor unions in the mining fields. So they proposed to certain operators in Western Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana and Illinois that a joint meeting between themselves and the United Mine Workers' representatives be held at Chicago to figure out if possible some way whereby, ostensibly, strikes could be avoided. The operators to whom this proposition was made and by whom it was acted upon were employers of the bulk of the membership of the United Mine Workers of America. This meeting, upon being held, resulted in what is known as the Chicago Agreement of 1898. By it what is known as the Joint Interstate Movement was established. It was designed to be and with two interruptions has been a continuous movement to date. By that agreement the miners secured an eight hour day in the Central Competitive Field and in turn agreed to protect the operators of that field from competition from the non-union fields. What measures were adopted and taken and what are now being used are in evidence. Some of them will be referred to in treating of the activities of the Union.

The bulk of the membership in 1898 resided in Western Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana and Illinois. That is so today. The coal produced in those sections of the United States competed in common markets in the north and west in 1898. That is so today. Therefore, the plan of the United Mine Workers of America to bring about and perpetuate a Joint Interstate Movement in that part of the country between themselves and operators engaged in competition with each other. And the name Central Competitive Field referred to those states as well as to their geographical location within the United States. That is so today.

While the Chicago Agreement of 1898 brought the eight hour day to the Union, in return for which the Union agreed to protect the operators of the Central Competitive Field from competition from the non-union fields, the eight hour day was not all the Union got by any means. By the 5th Clause of the Chicago Agreement of 1898 it was provided > "That on and after April 1, 1898, the eight hour work day with eight hours' pay, consisting of six days per week shall be in effect in all of the districts represented, and that uniform wages for day labor shall be paid the different classes of labor in the fields named, and that internal differences in any of the states or districts, both as to prices or conditions, shall be referred to the states or districts affected for adjustment."

Pursuant to the comprehensively suggestive terms of that clause of the agreement, and of a resolution passed for the purpose by the Scale Committee of the Interstate Convention held at Chicago which resulted in the making of the Chicago Agreement of 1898, a Joint Interstate Convention was held at Columbus in March, 1898, for the making of a uniform day work scale based upon the districts upon which the mining prices were based. This latter Convention evolved what is known as the Columbus Day Wage Scale. It established an inside day wage scale for an eight hour day, but failed to establish any wage scale for outside day labor. Of the inside day wage scale the Columbus Agreement says:

> "The above scale was arrived at by taking the average of the wages paid in all the competitive districts, and reducing said average to an eight hour day, then adding the advance to said average to correspond with the advance in price of mining to be paid April 1 next."

Regarding the failure to make a scale for outside day labor, that Convention passed a resolution reading as follows:

"Whereas, We have failed to agree upon a uniform rate of wages for the different classes of outside labor for the entire competitive field owing to the variation of conditions over which we have no control:

"Resolved, That the employing of outside day laborers around the mine, and wages to be paid the same, shall be left entirely to the employers and such employes in all the competitive districts, and the question of uniform wages for outside labor be referred to our next Interstate Joint Convention.

"Resolved, That where any members of the present force of outside day labor in the competitive field prefer to work in the mine in preference to accepting the wages offered for their services as outside day laborers, they shall be given places in the mine to mine coal."

Subsequently, a wage scale for outside day labor was agreed upon. And through this Joint Movement the wages of all men who work in and around the mines in Union territory are now fixed. The prices are competitive having regard not to the earning power of the men but to the competition existing between the operators participating in the Joint Movement, and to the competition those same operators encounter from coal from the non-union fields.

By the 5th Clause of the Chicago Agreement of 1898, the United Mine Workers of America succeeded in establishing the check-off system and the closed shop. Both of these are prominent features of the Union.

By the check-off the operators are made the collection agents of the Union, and compelled to collect from their employes and pay to the Union's officials what the Union demands from its members who are in the employ of the operators. The experience of the leaders of the United Mine Workers had shown them that their members were slow and uncertain pay. Hence the check-off system was devised. And with what wisdom it was devised and is still adhered to is shown by a consideration of the fact that these officials received in 1910 from the operators dealing with them more than $1,500,000.00.

By the closed shop concession the Union has succeeded in so intrenching itself that it has closed shop wage agreements covering all the men employed in and around all the mines in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Iowa, Kansas, Missouri, Oklahoma, Texas, Arkansas, part of Kentucky, part of British Columbia, part of Washington, all of Wyoming and Montana, Northern Colorado until some recent trouble there, part of Central Pennsylvania and the greater part of Western Pennsylvania.

The operators who participated in the establishment of the Joint Interstate Movement evidently thought they would receive enough benefit from the suppression of competition from the non-union fields to warrant them conceding the check-off and the closed shop. But reports of the later Joint Interstate Conventions are filled with bitter reproaches. And although the United Mine Workers as an organization have to date waged an industrial war against the non-union fields the Union operators still complain of the competition from those fields and urge the mine workers to greater efforts along the same line, and to other and more desperate and unlawful acts.

In sharp contrast to the manifest disposition of the Union operators to get from under the jurisdiction of the United Mine Workers is the attitude of the Union's officials. These know and assert their power and say to the operators of mines in unionized territory that those mines must be run Union, or not at all. And being confronted with a United Mine Worker membership of more than 300,000, but now at the time of the preparation of this statement, although, of course, outside of the record, claimed to be more than 400,000, and with an income of more than $1,500,000.00 per annum, the operators must perforce and do submit.

Following the granting of the check-off the Union had plenty of money to employ organizers. And the power of organizers was increased by the granting of the closed shop wage agreement. Membership increased from 32,000 in 1898 to 61,000 in 1899, from 61,000 in 1899 to 115,000 in 1900 and from 115,000 in 1900 to 198,000 in 1901. And then came the 1902 Anthracite Strike, and a reduction of membership to 175,000. Following the settlement of that strike which was waged to compel recognition of the Union, the work of the organizers was resumed. Membership increased from 175,000 in 1902, to 247,000 in 1903, from 247,000 in 1903 to 251,000 in 1904 and from 251,000 in 1904 to 264,000 in 1905. In 1906 a National strike was called, and membership dropped to 230,000. The 1906 strike was a disastrous one for the Union, but upon its settlement and funds coming to hand again from the check-off paid in by the operators in Union territory, the work of organizers was again resumed. Since then the work of organizing all the coal mines in the country has progressed to such a degree that in December, 1910, the Union had over 300,000 members, while the organization claims that it now has over 400,000 members and that there are now over 350,000 miners in the United States who are not members of that organization.

In this recital of this part of the history of the United Mine Workers of America, we have not sought to mention all the National strikes, and no mention has been made of the other innumerable strikes the organization has been concerned in.

Some idea of the warring proclivities of the Union may be derived from a consideration of the fact that from 1900 to 1910, both years inclusive, the National organization paid out of its own treasury more than $8,000,000.00 in support of strikes. The United Mine Workers spent more than $1,250,000.00 in Alabama for strike purposes and were finally run out of that state: nearly $1,500,000.00 for the same purpose in the Anthracite fields: $329,000.00 for the same purpose in the Irwin Field in Pennsylvania: and $669,000.00 for a like purpose in West Virginia, and with the result that in West Virginia their officials claim they are run out of the state, or their lives endangered if they stay, after being discovered.

Such is a part of the history of the United Mine Workers of America; and it is of their own making.

We will ask attention next to some of their principles, methods of procedure, and practices.

The Constitution of the International Union contains this clause:

"ARTICLE I.

SECTION 2. The objects of this Union are to unite mine employes that produce or handle coal or coke in or around the mines, and ameliorate their condition by methods of conciliation, arbitration or strikes."

The Constitution of District No. 6 contains this clause:

"ARTICLE I.

SEC. 2. One of the objects of this organization is to unite all employes in and around the coal mines of Ohio and the Panhandle District of West Virginia."

The Constitution of Sub-District 5 of District No. 6 contains these two clauses:

"ARTICLE I.

SEC. 2. The objects of this organization is to unite the mine employes of Belmont, Jefferson, Tuscarawas, Harrison and Carrol Counties in Ohio, and that part of Stark County south of Canton, other than the Massilon Seam, and Hancock, Brooke, Ohio and Marshall Counties of West Virginia, to ameliorate their conditions by methods of conciliation, arbitration or strike."

"ARTICLE I.

SEC. 3. All men are eligible and must be members of the U. M. W. of A. who work in and around the mines."

In connection with this design, evidenced by their Constitutional provisions, to control all labor employed in and around the coal mines of the country, the organization in its recent National Conventions has taken steps to bring about the solidification of its forces with the forces of the Western Federation of Miners, and the including of both of their organizations in a new department of the American Federation of Labor to be known as the Mining Department. The language of that part of the Resolutions relating to the Western Federation of Miners and that particular feature is as follows:

"We declare in favor of forming a mining department under the jurisdiction of the American Federation of Labor to control the mining industry of the American Continent, along similar lines to those departments which are now organized under the jurisdiction of the American Federation of Labor."

The United Mine Workers of America and the Western Federation of Miners have an agreement for the mutual exchange of membership transfer cards, and both unions are integral parts of the American Federation of Labor. The purpose of the American Federation of Labor as an integral whole is to bring all the International and National organizations of labor in this country into one family or federation of unions, and at the same time not to take away from the International and National unions the power and authority to regulate their own affairs.

Some of the rules and conditions enforced by the United Mine Workers of America are:

Men shall not work on idle days without permission of the Union, but if allowed to work such work must be evenly distributed amongst the mine's employees.

If railroad cars in which coal for shipment is to be loaded are not at the mine within thirty minutes after starting time the miners are to go home and not work that day.

If an operator shall so manage his business that four of his employes are out of cutting or drilling when work time comes in the morning, the mine committee may shut the mine down for the next day.

Sons of members of the United Mine Workers are to be given the preference of going into the mines when becoming of proper age.

Each two men shall have two working places in the mine, and the operator shall not employ more men until each two men have two working places.

The turn shall be uniform throughout the mine, in entry driving as well as mining coal in rooms.

Members of the mine committee are not to be required to stay at their working places in the mine if while away they are looking after the interests of the Union.

The men upon going to work in the mine are to be paid for two hours' work whether the mine runs two hours or not.

There shall be but one loader in each entry.

If the miner fails to produce clean coal the operator may close down his mine, but may not discharge the miner.

A miner may not be transferred from his working place inside the mine to a working place outside the mine unless he consents and unless in addition he is paid inside scale wages for outside work.

Where one company operates more than one mine on the same line of railroad in the same vein of coal the work between the respective mines shall be divided and made as nearly equal as business conditions will permit.

If for any grievance, real or supposed, any of the workmen shut down the mine each employe shall pay the company one dollar per day during such shut down; and if because of any grievance with any employe, real or supposed, the company shuts down its mine, it shall pay one dollar per day to each workman in and around the mine during such shut down.

Officers of the United Mine Workers may close down mines whenever they deem it to be for the best interests of the Union.

When officers of the United Mine Workers of America close down a mine, they may, if they deem it wise, close every other mine in the District, or they may distribute the men from the mine which they have closed down into any other mine or mines in the same District.

A method of procedure in the matter of Joint Interstate agreements is that whatever is agreed to is subject to either the previous or the subsequent ratification of the entire organization of United Mine Workers. The officials of that body have repeatedly tried to compel the operators who meet them in Joint Convention to admit the miners from other sections of the country who have, as those operators claim, no interest whatever in the result to be arrived at by the particular Joint Convention. And in reply to that objection it appears from the evidence that the Union's officials contemplate enforcing whatever agreement is arrived at regardless of the fact that particular operators or miners are not parties to the Joint Convention which may have agreed to the particular scale.

Some of the practices of the United Mine Workers of America are by their officials to drive operators out of business who incur their displeasure. This is done by means of strikes called or induced by them so that the operator is no longer able to operate his mine. Other things indulged in by the United Mine Workers are:

They have sent out men to the trade to boycott West Virginia coal.

They aim to have all wage agreements expire on the same date, both in the Anthracite and in the Bituminous Fields, and then by strike or by cessation of work throughout the entire United States compel compliance with their demands.

They engage in politics and maintain lobbies for the purpose of affecting legislation.

They put operators at a disadvantage who refuse to go into the Joint Interstate Movement.

They compelled operators in the Southwest territory to join the operators' association by refusing to allow their members to work for operators who did not join that operators' association upon that association agreeing not to employ any man who was not a member of the United Mine Workers of America.

They have constantly aimed to involve West Virginia and other non-union fields in local or National strikes: and that is their aim today.

Through their President, the defendant Mitchell, they threatened to stop every mine in the Pittsburgh district by filling them with organizers, if necessary, in order to compel compliance with their wishes. Mitchell boasted of this.

They recognize that organizing the mine workers of the non-union fields is the all important problem which confronts their Union, and they are constantly aiming to increase the cost of the West Virginia operators' coal through organizers and secret agents sent out to stir up strife.

We come now to a consideration of the relations which once subsisted between the United Mine Workers of America and the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company.

The Hitchman Coal & Coke Company opened and at first in 1903 operated its mine non-union. At the same time in 1903 the same persons owning the capital stock of the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company, together with some other persons not owners of any of the capital stock of the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company opened and operated a Union mine at Mount Pleasant, Ohio. Sometime prior to April 1, 1903, the United Mine Workers secretly placed organizers in the Hitchman mine. These men worked as miners. When these organizers had worked up a sentiment amongst the Hitchman miners in favor of joining the Union, the officials of the United Mine Workers notified the management of the Hitchman mine that unless the Hitchman mine was run Union they would close down the Mount Pleasant mine. Being confronted with that alternative, the management of the Hitchman mine agreed that if their employes wanted to join the Union no objection would be interposed provided the Union was run right. An official of the Union then formally organized the men into a Local of the United Mine Workers. The organizers disappeared, and the next day after the local was organized the men were called out on a strike. This was on April 2, 1903, and the men remained out until May 23, 1903. The occasion of the strike was that the Union's officials claimed that the Hitchman mine was not paying scale price on run of mine coal. The United Mine Workers then had a rule which is still in force—that the price for mine run shall be five-sevenths of the price of screened coal based upon the Hocking Valley. That scale even in Ohio was then as it is now a dead letter. Run of mine coal in Ohio is in practice paid for on the screened coal basis. The coal is mined and screened, and so paid for, and, if sold run of mine, is then all put together again. At the Hitchman mine, the railroad engine fuel was then and is now run of mine. When the Local was organized in 1903 the Coal Company was paying what it considered the proportionate price for run of mine coal based upon the screened coal price for the kind of coal at that mine, but paid for by the car. And when the strike was called to enforce the Hocking Valley price of five-sevenths the price of screened coal, the Hitchman management stated that such price was prohibitive, but agreed to permit a test to be made at which the Union's officials should be present to determine the true ratio between screened coal and slack at that mine. The Union's officials declined to do this until May 23, 1903, during which time the mine was kept idle, and the men not allowed to go to work. On May 23, 1903, the mine resumed work under an agreement that a two weeks' test be made. A test was made for a few days' by the Union's officials and then abandoned by them. They then settled with the Company on a price which was much less than the scale price for which the strike was called. The agreed price accepted as correct by these officials as the result of this test was about one cent and a half per ton more than the Company had been paying for run of mine coal paid for by the car prior to the men joining the Union. And that basis so established by that test has ever since it was made been the basis upon which the Company has paid its men for run of mine coal. That strike cost the Company $7,242.00.

On April 20, 1904, the Union's officials again called the Company's men out on strike. This time it was about the run of mine coal. They were not satisfied with the 1903 settlement and wanted to try what they called the average as distinguished from the tonnage basis. They kept the men out and the mine idle until June 15, 1904. When work was resumed it was on the average basis. This strike cost the Company $17,000.00.

When April 1, 1905, came the officials of the Union insisted on returning to the tonnage method on the basis of the 1903 run of mine settlement as the men claimed they made more money under that than they did on the average basis. The Company then readopted the 1903 tonnage basis.

As the time approached for the National strike which was called for April 1, 1906, the Company's management tried to arrange with the Union's officials to have the men continue at work and take care of the engine fuel trade. The Company offered to pay the 1903 scale, for which the Union's officials contended as the result of a modification of the demands of the United Mine Workers of America resultant upon the holding of the second 1906 Joint Interstate Convention between the miners and operators of the Central Competitive States. The Union's officials agreed to let the men employed at the Hitchman mine work under those conditions provided the Company did not mine any commercial coal and only took care of the railroad engine trade. But this permission was withdrawn afterwards and the men were ordered to quit work and did quit work on April 16, 1906. The men were out and the mine was idle until June 12, 1906. Before quitting work on April 16, 1906, the men employed at the mine tried to get permission from their officials to continue work loading engine coal, and explained that unless they were allowed to do so the B. & O. Railroad Company would haul in non-union coal and have it loaded into their engines from the Hitchman Company's tipple and bins. And in addition to that the Company's management notified these Union officials that if they called the men out on strike the mine would not be run Union again.

While the Hitchman mine was still being kept idle, these same officials, through the defendant Sullivan, effected a settlement with the Lorain Coal & Dock Company, and coal was shipped from the Wheeling Creek mine near Bridgeport, Ohio, to the Hitchman mine and loaded over that Company's tipple and from that Company's bins into engines of the B. & O. R. R. Co. It was part of the Railroad Company's contract with the Hitchman Company that in case of strikes at the Hitchman mine, the Hitchman Company would load over its tipple and from its bins into the B. & O. engines such coal as the B. & O. R. R. Co. might furnish for that purpose. This coal came from the same mine that the defendant Lewis worked at, when working in the mine, at his home in Bridgeport, Ohio. In addition to that, the Lorain Coal & Dock Company was a party to and represented by the same person at the Joint Interstate Conventions held in 1906, 1908 and 1910 between the operators and miners of the States of the Central and Competitive Field, that the defendant Sullivan settled the strike with.

The Hitchman Coal & Coke Company was not a member of any operators' association and was not a party to any of these Joint Interstate Conventions.

The settlement of this strike so far as the Lorain Coal and Dock Company was concerned was made by the defendant Sullivan between May 16, 1906, and May 20, 1906, and on May 22, 1906, B. & O. Railroad cars were found at the Hitchman mine loaded with coal from the Wheeling Creek mine which was taken up over the tipple and loaded into engines of the B.

& O. Railroad Company from the bins of the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company. The National strike of 1906 was not really settled in Sub-District 5 of District 6 until at a Joint Convention of miners and operators which was held at Wheeling, July 24th, 25th, 26th and 27th, 1906, when a settlement was effected on the basis of the 1903 scale.

During the period of time the Hitchman mine had been run Union, that is from April, 1903, to April, 1906, the Company paid nearly $10,000.00 to the Union's officials as check-off.

When the strike of 1906 came the men expected to receive benefits. They were not paid the benefits they were entitled to, and this fact coupled with the knowledge that Union coal was being loaded into the B. & O. engines over the Hitchman Coal Company's tipple and from its bins, which was mined at the Wheeling Creek mine of the Lorain Coal & Dock Company, at Bridgeport, Ohio, Lewis's home, made them discontented and indignant. They resented the fact that their Union officials would allow the Lorain Coal & Dock Company's mines to operate and yet would not let the Hitchman mine run when its management had offered to pay the 1903 scale, the very scale the Union was contending for.

The 1906 strike cost the Hitchman Company $24,500.00, and together with $17,000.00 in 1904 and $7,242.00 in 1903, made a loss of $48,742.00 in the three years the mine was operated Union.

By June 12, 1906, the Union men who had struck under orders April 16, 1906, came to an agreement of their own with the management of the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company, and the mine resumed work non-union. It has been run so ever since, and is running so today. And it is noteworthy that from the time the mine was opened up non-union in 1902 to April 1, 1903, when the mine started to run Union, there had been no strike of any kind, and that from June 12, 1906, to this date, or for more than the last eight years the mine has not lost a single day on account of labor trouble, and that all it has been threatened with has been that caused by the United Mine Workers of America in their efforts to reunionize plaintiff's men and mine and to re-assert their sway.

About the time, or shortly after the men started to work non-union at the Hitchman mine, the officials of the United Mine Workers of America came after and got the Charter they had issued to the Local when it was organized in 1903, and also got the seal. They wanted the money the Local had, but this was refused them, and they were told that the men at the Hitchman mine had paid the money into the Local treasury and that they were going to use it to get out a State Charter for an independent mine workers' organization. This plan was consummated and the record shows that on June 25, 1906, a Charter was issued by the Secretary of State of the State of West Virginia to the Independent Mine Workers of West Virginia.

The evidence establishes that beginning with June 12, 1906, the Company and its men entered into contracts whereby the men were to work non-union and the mine was to be run non-union, and that on this subject a memorandum employment card put into use in the Company's office on January 1, 1908, and used ever since and in use now is a correct statement of the agreement of employment entered into when the mine resumed work non-union June 12, 1906. The memorandum card is as follows:

"I am employed by and work for the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company with the express understanding that I am not a member of the United Mine Workers of America and will not become so while an employe of the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company; that the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company is run non-union and agrees with me that it will run non-union while I am in its employ. If at any time while I am employed by the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company I want to become connected with the United Mine Workers of America, or any affiliated organization, I agree to withdraw from the employment of said Company, and agree that while I am in the employ of that Company that I will not make any efforts amongst its employes to bring about the unionizing of that mine against the Company's wish. I have either read the above, or heard the same read."

In this connection, plaintiff filed a list of 579 names of its employes who beginning with January 1, 1908, and down to March 8, 1911, had signed such cards, and submitted the cards themselves for verification. These cards still remain in the custody of the Clerk of the Court.

When the United Mine Workers of America held their National Convention in January, 1907, at Indianapolis, Indiana, they were confronted with a decreased membership, depleted funds and an interruption in the Joint Interstate Movement. They promptly, by Convention action, took steps to recover the lost ground. And the minutes of their proceedings show that they passed a resolution approving the enforced action of their officers in having largely withdrawn the organizing forces because of want of funds, but at the same time directed that work to be resumed as soon as the state of the Union's finances would warrant it. That Convention also instructed the International officers to negotiate with the operators of the Central Competitive Field for an interstate meeting to be held sometime prior to the time of expiration of the contracts the Union then had, and a suitable length of time prior to April 1, 1908. These officers were also instructed to make a reasonable effort to secure the admission of all soft coal producing states desiring admission to the Joint Interstate Movement.

After months of work on the part of the Union, the 1908 Joint Interstate Convention was arranged for and subsequently held, but the operators from Illinois refused to participate. The miners from Illinois demanded admittance to that Convention, but were not admitted owing to the refusal of the operators from Western Pennsylvania, Ohio and Indiana to allow that unless the operators of Illinois could be induced to return. And it was then announced by the Union's officials that whatever agreement might be entered into at that Convention would have to be ratified by vote of the entire membership of the United Mine Workers. And the record shows that subsequently by a referendum vote of the entire membership of the United Mine Workers the two year contract negotiated at the 1908 Joint Interstate Convention was approved. And in addition an adjournment of that Convention was had until the first Tuesday in February, 1910, at 10 o'clock A. M., in the City of Toledo, Ohio. It was declared by that Convention that the Illinois operators and miners should be a part of the Central Competitive Joint Movement, and they were urged to become part of it, and to join in the next Joint Interstate Convention to be held in February, 1910.

Having seen that the National Convention of the United Mine Workers held in 1907 took steps to bring about the holding of a Joint Interstate Convention in 1908, for the same Central Competitive States, and also took steps to proceed with the organization of the non-union fields in accordance with previous plans to suppress the competition the operators of the States composing the Central Competitive Field had been so long complaining of, let us now see what really was next done on that line. And at this point we will ask the Court's attention to the effect of this general attempt at organizing all non-union fields as it was applied to the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company.

When the Annual Convention of the United Mine Workers of Sub-District 5 of District No. 6 was held at Wheeling in March, 1907, the defendant Rankin made a report as Secretary-Treasurer in which he said:

"We have one mine at Bellaire, O., and five mines in the Panhandle District which I believe should be organized. I believe those mines can be organized, and in my opinion this Convention should adopt some plan to organize those mines."

The evidence shows that he referred to the Hitchman mine, the Glendale and the Richland, amongst the five.

The Convention then passed the following resolution:

"RESOLUTION NO. 8.

Whereas, There are mines in the Panhandle District and Ohio that are not organized, and believing every mine should be organized, be it

Resolved, By this Ninth Annual Convention that the Sub-District officers together with the District officers, be authorized to take up the work of organizing every mine in the Sub-District as quickly as it can be done."

The evidence also shows that the Hitchman mine, the Glendale and the Richland were amongst those intended to be affected by Resolution No. 8.

Pursuant to that action, the officers of District No. 6 and of Sub-District 5 of District No. 6 took up the question of organizing the non-union mines in the Panhandle

District, and some of these defendants as such officers visited the management of the Hitchman mine and held a conference at the office of the mine at the mine.

And other conferences were subsequently had in Wheeling. These officials stated plainly that they wanted to organize the men and mine again, and resume their former contract relations with the Hitchman Company. The management of the mine declined to entertain the suggestion and reminded them of the warning given prior to the time the men were called out on strike April 16, 1910, that the mine would not be run Union again if that strike was called. The officials finally asked that the question of reunionizing be submitted to the Company's Board of Directors. That was done; the Board of Directors refused to have anything whatever to do with the Union and these officials and this action was promptly made known to them. These dealings ran along into the summer of 1907, and as a result reports were put in circulation by the Union's officials that the mine was going to be unionized, and that unless the men joined the United Mine Workers they would soon be out of their jobs.

The evidence also shows that each year during the time intervening between the opening of lake navigation, usually about December first, coal is shipped from West Virginia, Pennsylvania and Ohio to Lake ports for shipment by vessel to points in the north and west, from which points it is then distributed to the trade and to consumers generally. During this period of time operators make every effort to increase their working force of miners so as to take care of what lake trade they can get. It is also in evidence that the Hitchman Company had a large lake tonnage contracted for in the summer and fall of 1907, and that the defendants were aware of that. And so with that information they sought to cripple that mine by circulating reports that the mine was to be unionized. This deterred many miners from taking employment and also deterred the management of the Hitchman Company from hiring men indiscriminately for fear of the mine being filled with organizers.

The same persons who were the owners of the capital stock of the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company were the owners of another mine adjoining the property of the Hitchman Company. That mine was called the Glendale mine. It is so called and so owned now. The operation of that mine is managed from the office of the Hitchman Company by the same persons who manage the Hitchman mine. It was so in 1907.

Early in September, 1907, the defendant Thomas Hughes was sent by the officials of the United Mine Workers into the Panhandle District of West Virginia with instructions to organize the non-union mines, and compel them to recognize the Union or else be shut down. He visited the Hitchman mine, the Glendale and the Richland. As a result of his work, he succeeded in organizing the men at the Richland mine, and when the operator controlling that mine refused to recognize the Union Hughes shut the mine down. At the Glendale mine, Hughes succeeded in having twenty-two men join the Union and quit work. The loss of twenty-two men crippled that mine, but it still continued to operate non-union. At the Hitchman mine, Hughes, according to his statements, succeeded in having enough men agree to join the Union to enable him to unionize the mine, and he was about ready to shut it down, which he also stated he would do, if the management did not recognize the Union.

At this stage of the proceeding, the Hitchman Company, the Glendale Company and the Richland Company applied to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of West Virginia for injunctive relief. And a similar restraining order was issued in each one of the three cases.

At the Hitchman mine so great had been the disturbance created by the attempt to organize the men there that with the number the Company could safely employ it was unable to fulfill its contracts for delivery of coal for the lake trade from its mine, and from ten to fifteen thousand tons of coal had to be bought elsewhere.

The evidence also establishes that prior to the time Hughes was sent to the Hitchman mine the officials of the United Mine Workers, defendants, had been made fully acquainted with the terms of the contractual relation existing between the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company and its employes; and it also appears that while Hughes was at the Hitchman mine trying to organize its men he also was informed of the same thing.

All of the defendants have that knowledge now.

In order to facilitate this application for certiorari to this Honorable Court, the said Circuit Court of Appeals on the very day on which it entered its final decree in this cause, to-wit, June 1, 1914, entered the following order: "It is ordered that the mandate of this Court in the above entitled cause, be, and the same is hereby stayed pending application of the appellee to the Supreme Court for a writ of certiorari, provided said application is made on or before October 13, 1914."

Your petitioner presents herewith as a part of this petition a brief containing an exposition of the questions of law involved, and a certified transcript of the entire record of said cause in said Circuit Court of Appeals, supplemented by the original documents heretofore described.

ARGUMENT.

I.

WHY THE WRIT OF CERTIORARI SHOULD BE GRANTED IN THIS CASE.

It is well settled that this court will require a case to be certified by the Circuit Court of Appeals when the questions involved are of "gravity and general importance," affecting the interest of the nation in its internal or external relations; or in the interest of uniformity of decision. Ex parte Lau Ow Bew, 141 U. S. 583; The Conqueror, 166 U. S. 114; Forsythe v. Hammond, 166 U. S. 514; Montana Min. Co. v. St. Louis Min. and M. Co. 204 U. S. 204. No more conclusive evidence can be given of the "gravity and general importance" of the vital and far-reaching questions involved in this case than that contained in the extended and exhaustive discussions of them contained in the learned opinions delivered in the District Court and in the Circuit Court of Appeals. Judge Dayton opens his opinion with this statement:

> "On September 21, 1909, I filed a written opinion in this cause, reported in 172 Fed. 963. I there stated the purposes and objects of the bill and the proceedings had thereon and in the cause to that date. I do not, because of the necessary length of this opinion (99 printed pages), made necessary by the gravity and importance of the questions involved, deem it expedient to reiterate the statement of the case there made. * * * I have given several months' consideration and study to the questions involved. * * * In all these particulars these provisions violate the law guaranteeing under our free government, the rights of both the labor and capital involved and, further, the rights of the public consuming the product of such labor and capital."

The Circuit Court of Appeals, speaking through Judge Pritchard, has said:

> "We fully appreciate the important bearing the questions here presented have upon the welfare of the mine owners, as well as the laboring men, and are not unmindful of the delicate issues raised by the pleadings and proof in this cause. * * * The most important and far-reaching question is raised by the assignment of error wherein it is insisted that the Court below erred in holding that the United Mine Workers of America and its subordinate branches constitute an unlawful organization under the constitution, the common law, and the statutory law of West Virginia. * * * While labor and capital are vitally interested in the proper solution of these questions, it should be remembered that the public is likewise interested, and in some instances, affected to a greater extent than either labor or capital on account of the disputes and law suits growing out of these matters. Therefore, it may be properly said that these questions have a bearing upon the welfare of a large percentage of our people, and this is especially true as respect the coal industry. For instance the suspension of the operation of coal mining in this country would in all probability result in a coal famine, which would, in a large measure, embarrass the manufacturers, to say nothing of the effect it would have upon the individual consumer, and all reasonable means should be employed to avert such a disaster. Therefore we deem it our duty to define the rights of the parties to this controversy in so far as we may under the facts of this case, so as to set at rest as many as possible of the vexatious questions that are a source of irritation, as well as productive of much litigation."

Can this court ask any more convincing evidence of the fact that this is a case of "gravity and general importance," in the highest sense of that term, in as much as "the public is likewise interested, and in some instances affected to a greater extent than either labor or capital on account of the disputes and law suits growing out of these matters. Therefore, it may be properly said that these questions have a bearing upon the welfare of a large percentage of our people, and this is especially true as respects the coal industry." We respectfully submit that, apart from the testimony thus given by both of the lower Courts as to the "gravity and general importance" of the questions involved in this case, the Court will find from the following argument that a far-reaching question of federal law, touching the relations of capital and labor, is involved in this record which has never been passed upon by this Court.

II.

FIRST—THE WRONG.

We will argue the merits of this case by considering:

Under "The Wrong"—

(1) The plaintiff's rights.

(2) The defendants' rights.

(3) Salient points which differentiate the rights which the defendants claim from the rights which they really lawfully have.

(1) The Plaintiff's Rights.

We will sub-divide this into two heads:

(1) a. Is plaintiff's business legitimate?

(1) b. What are plaintiff's rights in the conduct of its business?

(1) a. Is Plaintiff's Business Legitimate?

Plaintiff's business of mining coal under contract with its employees that they will not join the union, and with a reciprocal contract on the part of plaintiff that it will run a non-union mine, is alleged in the bill, proved in the case, and constitutes the entire fact on the subject. But the parties differ as to the law upon such fact.

(1) b. What are Plaintiff's Rights in the Conduct of Its Business?

The plaintiff is engaged in a lawful industrial pursuit, and is conducting its lawful business in a lawful manner. As incident to this it has the right to employ labor and to make contracts in respect thereto, and these contracts may be made upon such terms as may be agreed upon by the parties.

There is no law in West Virginia which prevents plaintiff from contracting with its employes that they shall not become members of the United Mine Workers of America. Neither is there any law in West Virginia which provides that the plaintiff may not run its mine non-union.

(2) The Defendants' Rights.

We will sub-divide this into two heads:

(2) a. Are the defendants engaged in a legitimate business?

(2) b. What rights have the defendants in the conduct of their business?

(2) a. Are the Defendant's Engaged in a Legitimate Business?

Section 2 of Article 1 of the Constitution of District No. 6, United Mine Workers of America, in defining the objects of the United Mine Workers, says: "One of the objects of this organization is to unite all employes in and around the coal mines of Ohio and the Panhandle District of West Virginia."

And Section 3 of Article 1 of the Constitution of Sub-District 5 of District No. 6, United Mine Workers of America, says: "All men are eligible and must be members of the United Mine Workers of America who work in and around the mines." (Italics in this and in quotations following are ours.)

The proceedings of the National Convention of the United Mine Workers held at Indianapolis, January 15–22, 1907, show that the organization had a membership of 230,667 in 1906; that its income for the fiscal year ending November 30, 1906, was $1,081,408.32; its expenditures for the same period were $1,232,994.01, and that its balance on hand December 1, 1906, was $337,960.71.

The same proceedings of that Convention show that it is claimed for the United Mine Workers of America, that it is the largest labor organization in America.

From the proceedings of the Convention of Sub-District 5 of District 6, United Mine Workers of America, which was held at Wheeling, March 14–19, 1907, it appears that the paid up membership of District No. 6, United Mine Workers of America, was in 1906, 36,372, and that on March 1, 1907, Sub-District 5 of District 6, United Mine Workers of America, had 108 locals in good standing and a paid up membership of 12,500.

Indicative of the purpose of the Union are the following declarations of officials or delegates at the National Convention held at Indianapolis, January 15–22, 1907.

Speaking of organizing West Virginia and the unorganized sections of Pennsylvania, the defendant, Lewis, said: "We will organize them by a strike movement." Another delegate in his address at the same Convention, at the same time, said: "I agree with President Green and Vice-President Lewis that you never can get those men organized except at the end of a general strike, but I warn you not to go into it until you are thoroughly prepared." Another delegate in addressing the Convention, at the same time, in the same discussion, while recommending and explaining organization, said: "If we are able at a colliery to force all the men to become members of the Union we do so. If we are too weak, we do not attempt it, but keep gradually working among the men until we are able to accomplish our end." The defendant, John Mitchell, in addressing the Convention as President, said: "I believe it is possible, indeed I believe it is probable, that in the not distant future we will be able to inaugurate a movement in West Virginia and the other unorganized fields that will involve them in a strike, and then we will expect you to furnish the sinews of war, as you have done in the past, to keep these men in idleness." And he added, "If one year hence it is my judgment that a suspension of mining throughout the United States would be best, I will favor that policy."

Consider these Convention declarations in the light of the obligation of membership which is "As the mine workers of the entire country are competitors in the labor world, I promise to cease work at any time I am called upon by the organization to do so."

The United Mine Workers of America have been before the courts, State and Federal, many times, in one way or another. But the lawfulness of the entire organization, described on the membership card "United Mine Workers of America—one and indissoluble," has not been so specifically attacked, nor have that Union's unlawful purposes, its unlawful by-laws and its unlawful acts been so specifically shown as in this case now at the bar of this Court.

The Union's contentions and practices have, to a limited extent, from time to time, during some years past, been the subject of public discussion and condemnation, judicial and otherwise. But the case of United States v. Weber et al., 114 Fed. 950, is the only case which has come to our notice in which the United Mine Workers, as an organization, have been held to be unlawful because they are organized for an unlawful purpose—that is to say, to control all mining operations; hence to become and to be a monopoly in the supplying of labor in the coal mining industry. And this purpose has not been and is not now confined to bituminous coal, but embraces anthracite and all other kinds. Neither should it be overlooked that coal is one of the necessaries of life. Thus, with the enormous power which this organization has and wields, and in the enforcement of its varied and constantly enlarging demands, it periodically takes the operators by the throat, and to coerce them, it takes the country by the throat as well. The anthracite strike of 1902 is a sample. The contention then was for "recognition" of the Union, and inasmuch as the cause of controversy in this case now at the bar of this Court has for an underlying motive the same purpose, we will ask the Court to take judicial notice of the Anthracite Commission's Report, "Bulletin of the Department of Labor. No. 46. May, 1903."

That this Court may take judicial notice of that Report, we cite and rely upon Brown et al. v. Piper (1875), 1 Otto 37, 23 L. ed. 200, 201, 202, in which it was held—

> "Among the things of which judicial notice is taken, are:
> "The law of nations; the general customs and usages of merchants; the notary's seal; things which must happen according to the laws of nature; the coincidences of the days of the week with those of > the month; the meaning of words in the vernacular language; the customary abbreviations of Christian names; the accession of the Chief Magistrate to office and his leaving it. In this country, such notice is taken of the appointment of members of the cabinet, the election and resignation of senators," etc. The case of Hoyt et al. v. Russell (1886), 117 U. S. 401, 29 L. ed. 914, 915, holds: "It is undoubtedly true that judicial notice is not taken of purely private concerns, when they are not connected with or necessarily involved in a matter of a public nature; but it is otherwise when they are so connected or involved."

In Ames et al. v. Union Pacific Railway Company et al., 62 Fed., on page 13, Judge Caldwell took judicial notice of facts disclosed by the report of the "Commission of the United States Pacific Railway Company," 1887.

While the Commission held that the question of the recognition of the United Mine Workers of America was not within the scope of the jurisdiction conferred upon it by the submission, it is said in the Report on page 487:

> "The Commission feels, however, that it is incumbent upon it to give some expression to its views on the general question. From the correspondence which passed between the coal operators and the officers of the United Mine Workers prior to the strike, and which has been cited under the heading, 'History and causes of the strike,' from the voluminous testimony presented during the hearing before the Commission, and from the arguments of counsel and others, with which the public hearings closed, the Commission is led to the conviction that the question of the recognition of the union and of dealing with the mine workers through their union was considered by both operators and miners to be one of the most important involved in the controversy which culminated in the strike."

The Report then deals in a general way with the purposes of the United Mine Workers.

> "The order, as its name implies, is an organization to membership in which all workers who 'produce or handle coal or coke in or around the mines' are eligible. It claims a jurisdiction co-extensive with the coal producing industry in America. Its purposes, as stated in its Constitution (which is printed in full on pages 629 to 640) is to unite the mine workers and 'ameliorate' their condition by methods of conciliation, arbitration or strikes."

The Commission disapproved of the Constitution of the United Mine Workers and said (page 491):

> "The present constitution of the United Mine Workers of America does not present the most inviting inducements to the operators to enter into contractual relations with it."

And, with respect to the settlement of grievances, which might be passed upon arbitrarily, and be finally disposed of by the Union's side, regardless of the other side, or of real justice, and with respect to strikes, which by similar arbitrary action, regardless of the other side of the controversy, and of real justice, might be declared by the Union, to the great and unnecessary damage of the employer, the Commission held that the principle of Article X of the Union's Constitution was wrong, as its application violated reasonable rules for the adjustment of difficulties between employers and employes wherein the grievance should be considered by the parties immediately concerned, to-wit, by the employer and his employe; while if the matter involved happened to be of great scope and too large to be so settled and adjusted by immediate dealings between the employes and employer, that such grievance should be then referred to a higher power in the shape of one body to be made up of two other bodies representing the entire mining region affected by the decision of the question, the two bodies to be equally divided in numbers, representative of the employes on the one hand, and of the employers on the other hand, with a proviso that, upon their failing to agree, the question to be decided should then be referred to an umpire, whose decision should be final and binding in the premises.

Article X contained four sections, and sections 1, 3 and 4 of Article X of the present Constitution are quoted in the bill. On comparison they are found to be the same in 1907 as the Commission found and condemned them in 1902. Meanwhile, however, the United Mine Workers had reached out for more power and had created out of themselves a new and higher body, the International Union, and the word "International" therefore displaces the word "National" in those sections as they now exist. But the United Mine Workers stuck to their iniquitous provisions, and did not mend their ways.

The Commission, in making its decision, did not say whether the United Mine Workers were a lawful or an unlawful organization. All the Commission had before it on the question of the purpose of the Union to control all mining operations was embraced in Section 2 of Article 1, Constitution U. M. W. of A. Appendix F. Report, page 630. "The objects of this Union are to unite mine employes that produce or handle coal or coke in or around the mines, and ameliorate their condition by methods of conciliation, arbitration or strikes." But that language being equivocal, the intended monopoly could only be gathered, if at all, from a reading and due consideration of the Constitution, in its entirety, interpreted in the light of the Union's acts.

Section 2 of Article 1 of the present Constitution is the same as it was in 1902, but the question whether the United Mine Workers seek to be and are a monopoly is no longer debatable. The following constitutional provisions are before this Court:

> "One of the objects of this organization is to unite all employes in and around the coal mines of Ohio and the Panhandle District of West Virginia." Sec. 2, Art. 1, Const. Dist. No. 6, U. M. W. of A.
>
> "The object of this organization is to unite the mine employes of Belmont, Jefferson, Tuscarawas, Harrison and Carroll counties in Ohio, and that part of Stark county, south of Canton, other than the Massillon Seam, and Hancock, Brooke, Ohio and Marshall counties of West Virginia, to ameliorate their conditions by methods of conciliation, arbitration or strike." Sec. 2, Art. 1, Const. Sub-Dist. 5 of Dist. 6, U. M. W. of A.
> "All men are eligible and must be members of the U. M. W. of A. who work in and around the mines." Sec. 3, Art. I, Const. Sub-Dist. 5 of Dist. 6, U. M. W. of A.

Transposed, this last constitutional provision thus says:

> "All men who work in and around the mines are eligible and must be members of the U. M. W. of A."

The Commission, while not saying whether the Union was a lawful or an unlawful organization, did say, however, on page 490:

> "The Union must not undertake to assume, or to interfere with, the management of the business of the employer."

Yet read these constitutional provisions:

> "When it becomes necessary for a District President to close a mine, or when a mine or mines from some other legitimate cause has been forced to close down, said officers may, if they deem it wise, close every other mine in district, or may distribute those idle men into any other mine or mines in the district in which said mine or mines so closed may be situated." Sec. 2, Art. VIII, Const. Dist. 6, U. M. W. of A.
> "Any member of our organization working in or around the mine, working on idle days, or extra time, in violation of our Constitution, or agreements, shall be fined $2.50 for each offense." Sec. 15, Art. IX, Const. Dist. No. 6, U. M. W. of A., Sec. 3, Art. IX, Const. Sub-Dist. 5 of Dist 6, U. M. W. of A.

Strong light is thrown on these provisions and on the general design of the Union by the declaration as to the objects of the United Mine Workers of America contained in the excerpt from the proceedings of their Eighteenth Annual Convention held at Indianapolis, Indiana, January 15 to 22, 1907, which appears in the bill, and reads as follows:

> "Organized labor contends that as industry cannot exist without labor, labor has the right to say under what conditions it shall be employed, thereby dictating the management of the productive end of the business."

In connection with the thus openly acknowledged intention of the United Mine Workers of America as a national organization to dictate the management of the productive end of the coal business in this entire country, the provisions of the constitutions above quoted are living elements of, and confirm that Union's existence as, a monopoly at common law.

If the record thus made does not show an intention on the part of the national organization to control all coal mining in this country and to put into effect a "closed shop" in that industry, we are unable to comprehend the force of the English language.

At the foundation of the right of labor unions to exist there is the old common law which allowed the formation of guilds. But even guilds were regulated by statute in the early history of England. This was because they abused their power. And it came to pass that "combinations of laborers not connected with guilds were early made illegal, and the duty to labor and the settlement of the price of labor were made matters of public concern." 14 Ency. Laws of England, 2d Ed., London and Edinburgh, March, 1909, page 191, "Trades Unions." Hence, while it is correct to say that labor unions have the right to exist under the common law in West Virginia, they may exist for lawful purposes only, and they must not design, neither may they do, anything unlawful. In other words, no labor union in this state has any privilege over any other body of men or over any person, natural or corporate. It is not every labor union that violates the law, either in its purposes or in its practices. And the contention in the case now at the bar of this Court is not one whereby the right of labor unions to exist is questioned or will be determined. The question is, Are not the United Mine Workers of America an unlawful organization because they have not been confined within proper bounds? Their sphere of action is national. They aim to be and are a monopoly. And this monopoly they exercise in connection with the mining of coal, and coal is a necessity. It is true that coal is not, per se, a necessity in the same sense that air is, but to people living in the United States, situated as the United States are, in the North Temperate Zone, coal is a necessity. As much so as grain is. And it is not material whether coal is or is not a necessity in the Torrid Zone. Hence, the United Mine Workers of America have given a public interest to their occupation and to their organization. So true is this that for years the United Mine Workers of America as an organization and their aims and practices have been matters of grave public concern. As witness the anthracite strike of 1902, the appointment of a national commission by President Roosevelt and its report. The periodical adjustment of the national scale and the public's consequent unrest at each recurring period are matters of common knowledge and of common dread. And so long as this organization exists, and so long as its field of endeavor is national and exclusive of all other organizations for the mining of coal, and so long as the exercise of its unlawful power remains uncurtailed and unrebuked, just so long will the welfare of this country, the industry of its people and their comfort in life be and remain under a standing menace.

The case of Lohse Patent Door Co. v. Fuelle et al. (Supreme Court of Missouri, Nov. 25, 1908, rehearing denied Dec. 23, 1908), 114 S. W. Rep. 997, is an interesting case on a number of points, not the least of which is the one holding that at common law personal service—an occupation—could not be the subject of a monopoly. Baldly put, that statement would seem to hold that labor unions by combining and becoming national, or if not a combination of many into one, then one organization, national in character, would be lawful.

Judge Woodson says, 114 S. W. 1002, 1003: "According to the allegations of the petition and admissions of the demurrer, the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of the city of St. Louis, and the various other associations with which it affiliates, are composed of carpenters, joiners and other persons who do carpenter work and other labor in the construction of houses and other buildings in the city of St. Louis and throughout the country. It is alleged and admitted that the object and purpose of these associations is to shorten the hours of work and to increase the pay they are to receive for their labor. While it might be conceded that labor organizations might be proper subjects for legislative control and regulation, yet the legislature has not in its wisdom seen proper to do so; and at common law personal service—an occupation—could not be the subject of a monopoly. In discussing that question in the case of State ex rel. v. Associated Press, 159 Mo. loc. cit. 456, 60 S. W. 91, 104, 51 L. R. A. 151, 81 Am. St. Rep. 368, this court used this language: 'But there is nothing here on which a monopoly can attach. The business is one of mere personal service; an occupation. Unless there is 'property' to be 'affected with a public interest,' there is no basis laid for the fact or the charge of a monopoly.' The authorities seem to be uniform in holding that individuals have a perfect legal right to form labor organizations for the protection and promotion of the interests of the laboring classes and deny the power to enjoin the members of such organizations from peaceably withdrawing from the service of the employer. Wabash R. Co. v. Hannahan (C. C.), 121 Fed. 563; National Protective Asso. v. Cummings, 170 N. Y. 315, 63 N. E. 369, 58 L. R. A. 135, 88 Am. St. Rep. 648; Bowen v. Matheson, 14 Allen (Mass.), 499; Gray v. Building Trades Council, 91 Minn. 171, 97 N. W. 663, 63 L. R. A. 753, 103 Am. St. Rep. 477; Thomas v. Cin., etc., Ry. Co. (C. C.), 62 Fed. 803; Ames v. U. P. Ry. Co. (C. C.), 62 Fed. 7; Atchison, T. & St. F. Ry. Co. v. Gee (C. C.), 140 Fed. 153; Arthur v. Oakes, 63 Fed. 310, 11 C. C. A. 209, 25 L. R. A. 414. Many more adjudications of the same nature exist and might be cited, but as there is no conflict between the modern decisions upon this question, it would be a useless waste of time and labor to cite more. These decisions are based upon the law which permits every one to enter into any kind of a contract which has for its object and purpose the protection and promotion of the interest of the parties thereto, as well as the betterment of their condition in life, and that right to so contract is not curtailed or abridged if, perchance, the contract indirectly or incidentally operates in restraint of trade. We must therefore hold that the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners and their allied associations whom the defendants represent, are not unlawful combinations made and entered into in restraint of trade, but are legal and highly laudable when confined within proper bounds."

Professor Stimson, in his recent work on Federal and State Constitutions of the United States, 1908, says on page 30: "Coming last to the liberty of labor or trade, it is the more important to trace the appearance of the great principles falling under this head, for the reason that they have been largely lost sight of in American jurisprudence. The frequent enactment of acts against trusts, monopolies or contracts in restraint of trade, both state and federal, show that our legislatures, if not our Bench and Bar, must have substantially forgotten the body of the common law, to say nothing of the course of English constitutional history upon these matters.

"For the broader understanding of the liberty right involves as well as the liberty of life and person, the liberty to support life and family. That is, to exercise one's labor freely and without control, to acquire possessions, to earn wages and to exercise one's faculties in any lawful way, without competition by the State or any organism of the State and without restraint or hindrance by the government or by individuals. The extent of this right is the matter most discussed today, and therefore it is far the most important one to be considered. Closely connected with it is the right to private property, at least in so far as such property is the result of a man's labor, and the right to freedom of contract for such labor or in the exercise of such trade both as to reward or profits and conditions. There is probably no constitutional principle more often invaded by modern statutes than is this."

On page 38 Professor Stimson says: "The principle against monopoly or restraint of trade, though not expressed in any constitutional document, is quite as old as many that are, and may fairly be considered as part of the law of the land."

And on page 18 he says: "The right of liberty in trade or industry involves the notion of protection from any monopoly or any privilege even if granted by the State, as well as from any combination of guilds or other workmen."

Reverting to the case of Lohse Patent Door Co. v. Fuelle et al., 114 S. W. 997, we ask attention to two points. One of them is, that to be lawful at common law a labor union must be "confined within proper bounds." This principle applied prevents the lawful existence of a national organization which has for its purpose the suppressing of all competition in any given trade. That doctrine is the same that was applied in the case of Berry v. Donovan, 188 Mass. 353, and it is the same doctrine that was applied in the case of Jacobs, as President of the Protective Coat Tailors' and Pressers' Union, v.

Cohen et al., 183 N. Y. 207. The other point to which we call attention is Judge Woodson's reference to the doctrine of the Supreme Court of the United States announced in the case of Munn et al. v. The People of the State of Illinois (1876), 4 Otto 113 (94 U. S.), 24 L. Ed. 77. Judge Woodson held in Lohse Patent Door Co. v. Fuelle et al., that Munn's case did not apply to the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners and its allied similar associations, composed of carpenters, joiners and other persons, who do carpenter work and other labor in the construction of houses and other buildings in the city of St. Louis and throughout the country. A house is a convenience, but coal is a necessity. And a moment's consideration of the facts of this case now at the bar of this Court will show that the doctrine in the Munn case does apply to the United Mine Workers of America, the defendants in this case.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite, in rendering the opinion of the Court in the Munn case, held that a public interest may attach where property is put to a public use, and that the employer is then held to regulation by law. And the same opinion recognized that an employment may be of such a character as to be likewise invested with a public interest. For example, suppose a combination of all the growers of grain in this country. Will any one question that such a combination would be unlawful if, as a result, no one was allowed to raise grain unless he belonged to that union? And yet the United Mine Workers of America aim to let no one work in the mining of coal unless he belongs to their Union, and to let no operator mine coal unless under their jurisdiction and control.

Applying this to the case at bar the Court will take judicial notice of the fact that coal is a necessity; that it exists in different localities throughout the United States, and that from climatic conditions it is essential that coal be mined and be furnished, not only with regularity, but at reasonable prices, and be obtainable, freely and at all times, in the common markets throughout our entire land. The Court will also take judicial notice of the frequent national strikes which have been called and enforced by this national organization. It will take judicial notice of the widespread discomfort and distress which these strikes have brought about and which they must of necessity continue to bring about so long as that power of that Union is permitted to exist and to be exercised in that way. It will be admitted that it would not be obnoxious to the rule in the Munn case for men engaged in mining coal to unite and form a labor union in any given locality for proper purposes and to conduct their union in a proper way. But a combination of all such unions into a national one to aim and do as the United Mine Workers of America aim and do would be obnoxious to the doctrine in the Munn case.

If all the coal operators in this country were to combine and say that no one could mine coal unless he worked for their combination, and that no one could buy coal unless he paid their price, how long would such a thing be tolerated? Yet the United Mine Workers of America have not only openly organized themselves into a monopoly to control the entire coal mining industry of this country, but they have undertaken to establish the "closed shop" and to deny a man the right to work at that occupation unless he is a member of their Union, and to deny the right of an employer to operate a coal mine unless he runs it Union, and they have gone further and said to the coal consuming public, the mining of coal shall be suspended throughout the entire land until we shall have our way.

And it is their claim that not only have they the right to form such an organization, not only have they the right when and as they will to declare national strikes, which bring about national suffering, but that that right to exist and that right to bring about that suffering and to paralyze the industries of this country are rights guaranteed to them as citizens of the United States. Why? How?

(2) b. What Rights Have the Defendants in the Conduct of Their Business?

We will sub-divide this into two heads:

(2) b. 1. If the United Mine Workers are an unlawful body.

(2) b. 2. If the United Mine Workers are a lawful body.

(2) b. 1. If the United Mine Workers Are An Unlawful Body?

If the United Mine Workers are an unlawful organization in professed design or in fact, then no act done in carrying out an unlawful design or in doing an unlawful act can be held to be lawful.

(2) b. 2. If the United Mine Workers are a Lawful Body.

We will sub-divide this into two heads:

(2) b. 2 x. Defendants' permissive rights.

(2) b. 2 y. Plaintiff's affirmative rights which explain, limit, or modify defendants' rights.

(2) b. 2x. Defendants' Permissive Rights.

non-union mine. Unlike organizations which exist for religious and social advancement, many Labor Unions, and amongst them the United Mine Workers of America, while professing laudable purposes, have in fact purposes which are unlawful. In carrying out the various purposes of the Union some of which are lawful and others of which are unlawful, the defendants, as officers of the Union, do acts, some of which are entirely proper and others of which are entirely wrong. Imbued with the idea that certain of their acts are right, they affect to believe all of their acts are right. They forget or ignore the fact that a lawful act under one set of circumstances may become an unlawful act under a different set of circumstances. In such case, the motive is the controlling factor and determines the lawfulness or the unlawfulness of the act done.

In the present case, the real point at issue is, may the defendants, as officers of the United Mine Workers of America, organize plaintiff's non-union mine, and for the purpose of getting in position to organize that mine, may they send organizers amongst plaintiff's men and induce them to become members of the Union where it appears that the men employed by plaintiff are employed with an express agreement that they shall not join the United Mine Workers of America while in plaintiff's employ, and where it further appears that these defendants, as officers of the Union, have knowledge of these contracts plaintiff's men have made with it, and have knowledge of the additional fact alleged in the bill that plaintiff has contracted with each of its employees that while so employed the plaintiff will continue to run its mine non-union.

The propagation of the doctrines of religious and social bodies is in the main along the line of public meetings, to which the individual may resort on his own initiative and of his own free will. In some instances, personal appeal by personal visitation is made. Labor Unions, while, under ordinary circumstances, entitled to use both methods, resort chiefly to organizers. The United Mine Workers of America depend upon organizers. Hughes is one of their organizers, and it was over his efforts, as such organizer, to unionize plaintiff's non-union mine, that the controversy in this case arose.

It is unusual to find Labor Unions insisting, in Court, upon their right to organize non-union men in breach of contracts the non-union men have with their employer. Yet such a case is presented here. Generally, organization is effected in a different way. A boycott of the employer's output is instituted, and, by that means, the non-union employer is brought to his knees through failure of the consumer to handle his product. But to boycott a certain manufacturer of hats is one thing, and to boycott the product of a certain coal mine is another thing. In the case of the boycotted hat, success is comparatively easy. In the case of the boycotted coal mine, success is well-nigh impossible. The reason is obvious. Men are markets for hats; railroads and manufactories are markets for coal. So, inasmuch as boycotting, in the customary phase of its application, is not available to defendants as a ready means of unionizing plaintiff's non-union mine, they make the claim that they should be given the right to send organizers amongst plaintiff's men and induce a breach of the contracts the men have with plaintiff, and compel plaintiff to breach its contracts with such of its employees as the defendants and their organizers may, after effort, have been unable to induce to join the Union. We claim that such a course is wrong for two reasons. It involves an intentional breach of contracts existing between third persons, with whom defendants have no business or contractual relations whatever. And it really means to boycott the plaintiff, although in another form, by getting all men to refuse to work for plaintiff.

Therefore, in discussing the permissive rights of these defendants, engaged in running the United Mine Workers of America, in their efforts to increase the membership of the Union, and, particularly, in their efforts, in this case, to increase the membership of the Union through organizers, who undertake to bring about breaches of contracts existing between the employees and plaintiff, on the one side, and between the plaintiff and its employees on the other side, the permissive rights will not be interpreted to include the application of such rights to legitimating induced or enforced breaches of contract. Neither will the permissive rights herein spoken of be held to include the application of such rights in aid of the accomplishment of any unlawful purpose. Subject to the foregoing, now let us see what are the permissive rights of these defendants.

In the case of In re Higgins (C. C., N. D. Texas, 1886), 27 Fed. 443, 445, Judge Pardee said: "Labor organizations are lawful and generally laudable associations, but they have no legal status or authority, and stand before men and the law on no better footing than other social organizations."

The Texas & Pacific Railway Company was in the hands of receivers appointed by Judge Pardee. The receivers had agents. These agents had discharged as incompetent, and for absence without leave, a certain employee, and refused to reinstate him at the demand of a secret labor organization which claimed that this discharge was in violation of an agreement forced upon the managers of the road prior to the receivership. There was no complaint made to the receivers, or to the Court, by any employe, of bad treatment or insufficient wages or other grievances; and yet orders were issued from the secret organization to all their employes to quit work, to strike, to cripple the operations of the road; and many of the employes did quit, and induced and forced others to quit, and hindered and delayed the operation of the railway, and damaged the property in possession of the Court many thousands of dollars. Judge Pardee said of the reason assigned for the strike, that, if true, the reason was impertinent and that such demands could not be tolerated. He said further that the alleged reason was a mere scheme and pretense, and that the real motive for the order to strike was to compel a recognition of a certain secret labor organization (which, by evidence, had been shown to be about as arbitrary and autocratic in dealing with labor as the famous Six Companies of China) as an existing power, so that its officers should be consulted in the operation and management of railroads in which they do not own any interest, and of which they do not even pretend to be employes.

Along the same line of thought, Judge Brown in Old Dominion Steam-Ship Co. v. McKenna (C. C., S. D. New York, 1887), 30 Fed. 48, 50, said: "Associations have no more right to inflict injury upon others than individuals have. All combinations and associations designed to coerce workmen to become members, or to interfere with, obstruct, vex, or annoy them in working, or in obtaining work, because they are not members, or in order to induce them to become members; or designed to prevent employers from making a just discrimination in the rate of wages paid to the skillful and to the unskillful; to the diligent and to the lazy; to the efficient and to the inefficient; and all associations designed to interfere with the perfect freedom of employers in the proper management and control of their lawful business, or to dictate in any particular the terms upon which their business shall be conducted, by means of threats of injury or loss, by interference with their property or traffic, or with their lawful employment of other persons, or designed to abridge any of these rights,—are pro tanto illegal combinations or associations; and all acts done in furtherance of such intentions by such means, and accompanied by damage, are actionable." He cited many authorities.

In the case of Thomas v. Cincinnati, New Orleans & Texas Pacific Railway Company, In re Phelan (C. C., S. D. Ohio, W. D. 1894), 62 Fed. 803, 817, Judge Taft said: "Now, it may be conceded in the outset that the employes of the receiver had the right to organize into or to join a labor union which should take joint action as to their terms of employment. It is of benefit to them and to the public that laborers should unite in their common interest and for lawful purposes. They have labor to sell. If they stand together, they are often able, all of them, to command better prices for their labor than when dealing singly with rich employers, because the necessities of the single employee may compel him to accept any terms offered him. The accumulation of a fund for the support of those who feel that the wages offered are below market prices is one of the legitimate objects of such an organization. They have the right to appoint officers who shall advise them as to the course to be taken by them in their relations with their employer. They may unite with other unions. The officers they appoint, or any other person to whom they choose to listen, may advise them as to the proper course to be taken by them in regard to their employment, or, if they choose to repose such authority in any one, may order them on pain of expulsion from their union, peaceably to leave the employ of their employer because any of the terms of their employment are unsatisfactory."

In that case, Phelan was before the Court for contempt as a result of a conspiracy between himself and Debs and others to tie up the Cincinnati, New Orleans & Texas Pacific Railway which was in the hands of a receiver appointed by Judge Taft. The conspiracy consisted of an effort of the American Railway Union to compel the Pullman Company to comply with certain demands of the Pullman Company's employes, and in aid thereof to compel the receiver to abandon the hauling of Pullman cars, the Union going so far as to urge all of the members of the American Railway Union throughout the United States to make similar demands of the different railways throughout the country, or else leave the service of their employer. Phelan urged the employes to quit the service of the receiver and the other railroads of Cincinnati, and to tie them all up, and to prevent other persons from taking their places, by persuasion if possible, by clubbing if necessary.

The Pullman Company's employes were not members of the American Railway Union, and when the Pullman Company closed its works, rather than grant an increase of wages which the employes had demanded, the American Railway Union, which met in general convention shortly thereafter, took up the cudgel on behalf of the employes of the Pullman Company. The motive actuating the American Railway Union may have been sympathy, or it may have been to exhibit and magnify the power of the American Railway Union itself. Suffice it to say, the controversy was not between the employes and the receiver of the Cincinnati, New Orleans & Texas Pacific Railway, except so far as these employes, after being incited to do so, adopted the quarrel of the Pullman Railway Company's employes as their own.

In restraining Phelan and others from inducing the receiver's employes to quit work and tie up the Cincinnati, New Orleans & Texas Pacific Railway until the receiver would agree not to carry Pullman cars in their trains, Judge Taft held that the action of the American Railway Union was wrong for two reasons; first, the American Railway Union was interfering with the contractual relations existing between the receiver and the Pullman Company for the hauling of Pullman cars, to which contractual relations the American Railway Union was a stranger. Hence, the Railway Union was an intermeddler. And second, by its course of action, the American Railway Union was engaged in a boycott. It was seeking to drive the Pullman Company out of business, unless that Company would accede to the demands of its employes. The American Railway Union had no contractual or other relations with the Pullman Company. The employes of the Pullman Company and the Pullman Company made their own contracts governing their own mutual relations. And to such contracts, the Railway Union was likewise a stranger.

Judge Taft further held: "A malicious or unlawful interference with the business of another by inducing his employes to leave his service is an actionable wrong and subjects the offender to liability for the loss sustained." 62 Fed. 816.

In the case of Wabash Railroad Company v. Hannahan and others (C. C., E. D. Missouri, E. D. 1903), 121 Fed. 563, 568, 569, Judge Adams said:

> "An employee has an unquestionable right to place a price and impose conditions upon his labor at the outset of his employment, or, unless restrained by contract obligations, upon the continuance of his labor at any time thereafter; and, if the terms and conditions are not complied with by the employer, he has a clear right either not to engage or having engaged in his service to cease from work. What one may do all may do.

"They may seek and obtain counsel and advice concerning their rights, duties, and obligations in relation to their employer, and persons interested in their welfare may advise, aid, and assist them in securing such terms and conditions of service as will best subserve their interests, and what they may lawfully do singly or together they may organize and combine to accomplish.

"In like manner, as capital is combined for legitimate purposes, so labor may combine for legitimate purposes, but this right of combination, and the resulting right to strike or quit their employment, is a weapon for the defense and protection of employees, and not a weapon of attack. They may, by peaceful and lawful combination and concert of action, be able to so control the supply of labor as to compel the employer to come to their terms, but they are not at liberty to make use of this weapon to otherwise interfere with or injure the employer or co-employe. The clear line of demarkation, recognized by all the authorities, is that the lawful and permissible strike must not be attended by violence to or destruction of property or by other coercive measures intended to prevent the employer from securing other employees or otherwise carrying on his business according to his own judgment."

In that case, the Wabash Railroad Company sought to enjoin Hannahan, grand master of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen, W. G. Lee, vice grand master of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, and officers and members of the joint protective board of the first-mentioned and of the general grievance committee of the second-named order. The plaintiff claimed that the defendants were trying to unionize the Wabash road. The defendants denied this, and said that as officers they were acting at the request and by the authority of a large majority of plaintiff's employes, who were members of the two Brotherhoods, and they further said they were in good faith making an effort to better the condition of the men's service and to secure a higher rate of wages therefor; and that any strike which they were about to sanction was intended only for the purpose of peaceably asserting the rights which they demanded. Upon the bill, answers and affidavits, Judge Adams found that plaintiff had not proved that the defendants were engaged in trying to unionize the Wabash road, and further found that the defendants were representing employes of the Wabash road and that these employes were members of the orders, which were represented by the defendants, and further found that at the time there was a very general demand for an increase of wages and change in rules and conditions of service by employes of the Wabash road, and that this demand had been brought to the attention of the railroad company. Under those circumstances, Judge Adams refused to enjoin the defendants from ordering a strike of the members of their Brotherhoods who were then working for the Wabash road.

In his opinion, above quoted, Judge Adams gives expression to—"What one may do all may do," and "what they may lawfully do singly or together they may organize and combine to accomplish." This doctrine is taken from the case of Arthur v. Oakes (C. C. A., Seventh Circuit), 11 C. C. A. 209, 63 Fed. 310. And while the use Judge Adams makes of that doctrine in the sentences quoted was entirely proper in view of the facts of the case he was deciding and to the extent of his decision, that doctrine as expressed in that and similar language has unfortunately been taken by Labor Unions to mean a carte blanche.

In the case of United States v. Debs et al., Union Trust Company v. Atchison, Topeka & Sante Fe Railroad Company (C. C., N. D. Illinois, 1894), 64 Fed. 724, 763, Judge Woods said:

> "In the recent case of Arthur v. Oakes (C. C. A., 7th Circuit), 63 Fed. 310, it was decided, with my full concurrence in the opinion, that a court of equity will not, 'under any circumstances, by injunction, prevent one individual from quitting the personal service of another;' and in respect to the right of employes, singly or in concert, to quit work, and of others to advise them on the subject, there is no present necessity for adding to what was said in that case, further than to observe that neither expressly nor by implication does the opinion there delivered lend the remotest sanction to the proposition asserted by one of the counsel for the defendants, that in free America every man has a right to abandon his position, for a good or a bad reason, and that another, for good or bad reason, may advise or persuade him to do so. Manifestly that is not true. If it were, a servant might quit his place, and another might advise him to quit, in order to make way for the entry of thieves or burglars into the employer's house,—a suggestion at which simple minds revolt, and for which the acutest can invent neither justification nor apology. The rule is familiar in criminal jurisprudence that any act, however innocent in itself, becomes wrongful or criminal when done in furtherance of an unlawful design. But whether or not, in a particular case, an injunction will be appropriate, and to what extent it shall go if granted, will depend on other considerations than the mere wrongfulness or illegality of the act or conduct proposed to be enjoined. The right of men to strike peaceably, and the right to advise a peaceable strike, which the law does not presume to be impossible, is not questioned. But if men enter into a conspiracy to do an unlawful thing, and, in order to accomplish their purpose, advise workmen to go upon a strike, knowing that violence and wrong will be the probable outcome, neither in law nor in morals can they escape responsibility."

In the case of Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Company v. Switchmen's Union of North America and others (C. C., W. D. New York, 1907), 158 Fed. 541, 543, the rights of workmen are defined by Judge Hazel in the following language:

"That workmen may strike or quit their employment ad libitum is well recognized by all the authorities, and that they may do so singly or in concert, even though it be in violation of their service contract, has also been held. In Hopkins v. Oxley Stave Co., 83 Fed. 912, 28 C. C. A. 99, the principle is thus stated: 'The courts have invariably upheld the right of individuals to form labor organizations for the protection of the interests of the laboring classes, and have denied the power to enjoin the members of such associations from withdrawing peaceably from any service, either singly or in a body, even where such withdrawal involves a breach of contract.' And in Arthur v. Oakes, 63 Fed. 310, 11 C. C. A. 209, 25 L. R. A. 414, an earlier case, Mr. Justice Harlan, sitting in the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit, and writing the opinion of the Court, says: 'Those employes having taken service, first with the company, and afterwards with the receivers, under a general contract of employment, which did not limit the exercise of the right to quit the service, their peaceable co-operation as the result of friendly argument, persuasion, or conference among themselves, in asserting the right of each and all to refuse further service under a schedule of reduced wages, would not have been illegal and criminal, although they may have so acted in the firm belief and expectation that a simultaneous quitting without notice would temporarily inconvenience the receivers and the public.' The Court broadly held that the employes in good faith and peaceably had the right to leave the service of their employer, but without injuring or interfering with the free action of others. It follows, therefore, whenever a conspiracy is alleged that it must be shown that the intention of the conspirators was to inflict wrong upon the complainant, and if the defendants herein acting together tried to have the employes break their contract, or urged them to leave the employ of the complainant, the court has power to interfere."

In the case of United States ex rel. Guaranty Trust Company of New York v. Haggerty et al. (C. C., N. D. West Virginia, 1902), 116 Fed. 510, 515, 516, 517, Judge Jackson said:

"I do not question the right of the employes of this company to quit work at any time they desire to do so, unless there is a contractual relation between them and the employer which should control their right to quit. At the same time I do not recognize the right of an employer to coerce the employes to continue their work when they desire to quit."

And again he said:

"While I recognize the right for all laborers to combine for the purpose of protecting all their lawful rights, I do not recognize the right of laborers to conspire together to compel employes who are not dissatisfied with their work in the mines to lay down their picks and shovels and to quit their work, without a just or proper reason therefor, merely to gratify a professional set of 'agitators, organizers, and walking delegates,' who roam all over the country as agents for some combination, who are vampires that live and fatten on the honest labor of the coal miners of the country, and who are busybodies creat> ing dissatisfaction amongst a class of people who are quiet, well-disposed, and who do not want to be disturbed by the unceasing agitation of this class of people."

And again he said:

> "Their mission here is to foment trouble, create dissatisfaction among the employes in coal mines, producing strikes, which tends greatly to damage and injure the business of the employers."

And again he said:

> "The right of a citizen to labor for wages that he is satisfied with is a right protected by law, and is entitled to the same protection as free speech, and should be better protected than the abuse of free speech, in which the organizers and agitators indulge in trying to produce strikes."

In that case the defendants, Haggerty and others, all non-residents of West Virginia, came into the State as organizers for the United Mine Workers of America, and undertook to organize the mines of the Clarksburg Fuel Company. Their method was to induce employes who were not dissatisfied with the terms of their employment to strike, and the Court enjoined such methods on the ground that these organizers were actuated by a desire to inflict injury and damage upon the employers.

In the case of United States v. Weber et al. (C. C., W. D. Virginia, 1902), 114 Fed. 950, 953, Judge McDowell said:

> "The right of the employes of the receivers to voluntarily join a union that has only legal purposes in view cannot be denied. Moreover, the right to induce, by legal methods and fair moral suasion, the > employes of the receivers to join such an organization is not denied. But if the object of the union is illegal, or if the methods employed by it, either to induce acquisitions to its ranks or to accomplish its ulterior purposes, are illegal, it appears to be well settled that the persons who combine in such efforts are conspirators."

In that case, Judge McDowell, in treating of the legality of the motive actuating the United Mine Workers of America, who were at the time trying to organize certain mines in Virginia, which were in the hands of receivers appointed by the Federal Court, said:

> "In the first place, it is hardly open to serious question that the ultimate purpose of the union is not legal. This purpose is to secure control of mining operations, including those under the management of the receivers of this Court. Confessedly, control is desired for this purpose: If the union miners in some other State make complaint of grievance,—the justness of the complaint to be judged solely by the union,—the union will be in a position to enforce compliance with their demands by ordering and carrying into effect a general strike.
> "Can this Court rightfully surrender control of the works under its charge to the United Mine Workers? On authority it is clear that it cannot. See In re Higgins (C. C.) 27 Fed. 445; In re Wabash R. Co. (C. C.) 24 Fed. 217; In re Doolittle (C. C.) 23 Fed. 544; Thomas v. Railroad Co. (C. C.) 62 Fed. 803. On reason, also, it is equally clear."

In the case of In re Wabash Railroad Company (C. C., W. D. Missouri, 1885), 24 Fed. 217, 220, Judge Krekel said:

> "Courts do not interfere between employer and employes, except to declare what the rights of the parties are, and to keep order. Men may work or cease working as they choose, provided they violate no contract. They may combine and peaceably seek to forward their interest in any manner, provided they do no violence to others' rights, or commit no violation of law."

In the case of Curran v. Galen, President of Brewery Workingmen's Local Assembly et al. (1897), 152 N. Y. 33, 37 L. R. A. 802, 46 N. E. 297, the Court said (37 L. R. A. 804) Per Curiam—

"It is proper and praiseworthy, and perhaps falls within that general view of human society which perceives an underlying law that men should unite to achieve that which each by himself cannot achieve, or can achieve less readily. But the social principle which justifies such organizations is departed from when they are so extended in their operations as either to intend or to accomplish injury to others. Public policy and the interests of society favor the utmost freedom in the citizen to pursue his lawful trade or calling, and if the purpose of an organization or combination of workingmen be to hamper or to restrict that freedom, and, through contracts or arrangements with employers, to coerce other workingmen to become members of the organization and to come under its rules and conditions, under the penalty of the loss of their positions and of deprivation of employment, then that purpose seems clearly unlawful, and militates against the spirit of our government and the nature of our institutions. The effectuation of such a purpose would conflict with that principle of public policy which prohibits monopolies and exclusive privileges."

In that case, Curran, who was an engineer by trade, was employed from day to day by the Miller Brewing Company and was earning a good income, and had constant employment. There was a voluntary association in the City of Rochester, where he lived, called the Brewery Workingmen's Local Assembly, 1,796. It was composed of workingmen employed in the brewery business in Rochester, and was a branch of a national organization known as the Knights of Labor. Curran was solicited to join the union, but declined. He was then threatened that unless he joined and paid his initiation fee and subjected himself to the rules and regulations of the union, the union would obtain Curran's discharge from the employment he then had, and would make it impossible for him to obtain employment in Rochester or elsewhere. He still refused; then he was discharged. The Miller Brewing Company belonged to the Ale Brewers' Association of Rochester, and that association had an agreement with the union that no employe should work for a longer period than four weeks without becoming a member of the union. The defense put up was, that Curran was retained in the employ of the Miller Brewing Company for more than four weeks after he was notified of the provisions of the agreement, which required him to become a member of the union, and that upon his continued refusal to join the union, the defendants had simply notified the Miller Brewing Company of its contract, and thereupon Curran had been discharged.

In the opinion of the Court, this language appears—

are not consistent with a purpose to oppress the individual who prefers by single effort to gain his livelihood. If organization of workingmen is in line with good government, it is because it is intended as a legitimate instrumentality to promote the common good of its members. If it militates against the general public interest, if its powers are directed towards the repression of individual freedom, upon what principle shall it be justified?"

In the case of Iron Molders' Union No. 125 of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, et al. v. Allis-Chalmers Company (C. C. A. Seventh Circuit, 1908), 166 Fed. 45, the correlative rights and the correlative obligations of employer and employes when engaged in a strike or lockout are in the language of Judge Grosscup clearly and compactly set forth. That case was a strike case. The Allis-Chalmers Company employed foundrymen and other persons who were members of the Iron Molders' Union No. 125 and of the other defendant unions. Certain demands, including increased wages, were made by the employes through these unions, acting through a conference committee. The Allis-Chalmers Company increased the wages to an amount exceeding the sums demanded, but refused the other demands. Thereupon the employes struck. The bill states that the object of the strike was to control the employment of the molders' apprentices, handy men, superintendents, and assistant superintendents, and to prevent any such mechanics from working at their trade without first becoming members of the union. The bill averred that those apprentices were learning the molders' trade and that some of them had a long time and others had a short time to work. Section 16 of the decree (166 Fed. 48) relates solely to apprentices, and by the bill these apprentices had unfulfilled time contracts. But the language of the Appellate Court (166

Fed. 49, 50) in including "others" with apprentices would seem to indicate that that Court intended to extend to the Allis-Chalmers Company the protection of the Court's prohibition against persuasion to all persons employed by it to serve for a definite time, whether in fact such persons were, or were not, apprentices. The Allis-Chalmers Company then undertook to get other persons to take the place of the strikers, and the defendants alleged that in so doing the Allis-Chalmers Company was endeavoring to coerce the defendants to return to work, and that it had given out that it would not employ any of the defendants so long as they were members of the union. In this contest, the defendants resorted to persuasion to induce the new men to quit work and to induce men not to go to work. They also resorted to persuasion to induce persons under contract for a specific length of time to quit work, and they resorted to picketing. Having been enjoined by the lower court from doing these amongst other things (150 Fed. 155, 161) an appeal was taken.

The Circuit Court of Appeals held that there was in that case a genuine struggle of labor by the employes of the Allis-Chalmers Company to obtain better terms and conditions from their employer, and that in such a struggle the rights of the contending sides were not only equal but mutual. The Court accordingly held that inasmuch as the Company was allowed to persuade men to take the places of their striking employes, therefore the striking employes had the right to persuade these men to quit working or to persuade others not to take the places of the strikers. This was on the ground of equality of rights. But the Court held that the strikers were not entitled to use persuasion to induce the Company's apprentices and others to break their contracts to serve for definite times. And with reference to the last mentioned holding, the Court said:

> "And the reason, we believe, is quite plain. Each party to such a contract has a property interest in it. If either breaks it, he does a wrong, for which the other is entitled to a remedy. And whoever knowingly makes himself a party to a wrongful and injurious act becomes equally liable."

So that the Court adhered to the general doctrine that even in the case of a strike the strikers are not justified in bringing about a breach of contracts existing between their employer and third persons.

And owing to the fact that that suit was brought to protect the property rights of the Allis-Chalmers Company and that these property rights were alleged to be simply employments at will without other stipulation or agreement, save in the case of the apprentices who had unfulfilled terms of service, and save also as to any other employes with whom the Company had contracts to serve for definite times, the Court drew a distinction between the Company's rights with regard to its men who were employed at will and the Company's rights with regard to its men who were employed to serve for definite times, and held that contracts of service at will were not property rights superior to the rights of employes of the Company on strike for legitimate purposes, who had also been employes at will, where there still existed between the striking employe and his employer the peculiar relationship created by the existence of a strike or lockout, a strike or lockout, as to the employes who have not finally and in good faith abandoned their employment, being held by the Court not to completely terminate the relationship between the parties. It will be noticed that the Appellate Court does not say that the only kind of a contract which will be protected is one for a definite length of time. The holding is, that a contract for a definite length of time will be protected. It will be borne in mind that an employer and an employe may contract with each other on any terms, in any way, and on any subject matter they please, so long as not contrary to law. And inasmuch as the making of the contract would create a property right in which each party has an interest, strikers would be precluded from bringing about a breach of such contracts. A fortiori would such contracts be protected against intermeddlers. It will not be forgotten that the Appellate Court, in that case, was dealing with a genuine labor struggle for lawful purposes, and that it was defining the rights of quasi employes. The defendants in that case were not simply intermeddlers. So for the purpose of defining the rights of strikers in such a case in the use of persuasion, the Appellate Court held that the incorporeal value of a going business, based upon the right to the continuing services of those who accepted employment at will until such services were terminated by the free act of one or the other party to the employment, does not constitute property for the purpose of injunctive relief. But it is nowhere suggested that as against an intermeddler an employer does not have a property right sufficient for injunctive relief, where he bases his right upon the incorporeal value of a going business and the further right to the continuing services of those who accept employment at will until such services are terminated by the free act of one or the other party to the employment. A fortiori where the value of the going business is further based on a successful struggle against a labor union, where the labor union interferes with the business of the employer by inducing its employes to join the union and break contracts, which forbid them joining, and where the Union is trying to resume its sway over the recalcitrant employer.

Judge Grosscup recognized that there was some liability of misconstruction of the Court's opinion, and while concurring said:

> "The foregoing opinion so compactly and clearly sets forth the correlative rights and the correlative obligations of employer and employes when engaged in a strike or lockout, that it is with hesitation that I add this word: and I only add it that nothing that is contained in the opinion, may be construed to relate to the correlative rights and the correlative obligations of employer and employes in any relationship other than their somewhat anomalous relationship pending a strike or lockout.
> "A strike is cessation of work by employes in an effort to get for the employes more desirable terms. A lockout is a cessation of the furnishing of work to employes in an effort to get for the employer more desirable terms. Neither strike nor lockout completely terminates, when this is its purpose, the relationship between the parties. The employes who remain to take part in the strike or weather the lockout do so that they may be ready to go to work again on terms to which they shall agree—the employer remaining ready to take them back on terms to which he shall agree. Manifestly, then, pending a strike or lockout, and as to those who have not finally and in good faith abandoned it, a relationship exists between employer and employe that is neither that of the general relation of employer and employe, nor again that of employer looking among strangers for employes, or employes seeking from strangers employment. And it is with respect to this somewhat anomalous relationship that, as I understand it, this opinion speaks; a statement that it seems to me ought to be made to confine the opinion to the actual situation to which it is intended to relate—to differentiate what we say from what might arise in cases where, neither strike nor lockout pending, persuasion is resorted to to induce other employers not to employ given applicants for employment, or to persuade employes not to take employment with given employers, upon which questions we do not, as I understand it, express any opinion."

Judge Grosscup's warning that the opinion of the Court in Iron Molders' Union v. Allis-Chalmers Company, 166 Fed. 45, is not to be construed to relate to the correlative rights and the correlative obligations of employer and employes in any relationship other than their somewhat anomalous relationship pending a strike or lockout, has manifest reference to the work of an intermeddler. And in this connection we want to call attention to Judge Grosscup's language In re Charge to Grand Jury (D. C., N. D. Illinois, 1894), 62 Fed. 828, 831, 832, 833:

"I recognize, however, the right of labor to organize. Each man in America is a freeman, and, so long as he does not interfere with the rights of others, has the right to do with that which is his what he pleases. In the highest sense, a man's arm is his own, and, aside from contract relations, no one but he can direct when it shall be raised to work, or shall be dropped to rest. The individual option to work or to quit is the imperishable right of a freeman. But the raising and dropping of the arm is the result of a will that resides in the brain, and, much as we may desire that such wills should remain entirely independent, there is no mandate of law which prevents their association with others, and response to a higher will. The individual may feel himself, alone, unequal to cope with the conditions that confront him, or unable to comprehend the myriad of considerations that ought to control his conduct. He is entitled to the highest wage that the strategy of work or cessation of work may bring, and the limitations upon his intelligence and opportunities may be such that he does not choose to stand upon his own perception of strategic or other conditions. His right to choose a leader, one who observes, thinks, and wills for him,—a brain skilled to observe his interest,—is no greater pretension than that which is recognized in every other department of industry. So far, and within reasonable limits, associations of this character are not only not unlawful, but are, in my judgment, beneficial, when they do not restrain individual liberty, and are under enlightened and conscientious leadership.

"But they are subject to the same laws as other associations. The leaders to whom are given the vast power of judging and acting for the members are simply, in that respect, their trustees. Their conduct must be judged, like that of other trustees, by the extent of their lawful authority, and the good faith with which they have executed it. No man, in his individual right, can lawfully demand and insist upon conduct by others which will lead to an injury to a third person's lawful rights. The railroads carrying the mails and interstate commerce have a right to the service of each of their employes until each lawfully chooses to quit; and any concerted action upon the part of others to demand or insist, under any effective penalty or threat, upon their quitting, to the injury of the mail service or the prompt transportation of interstate commerce, is a conspiracy, unless such demand or insistence is in pursuance of a lawful authority conferred upon them by the employes themselves, and is made in good faith in the execution of such authority. The demand and insistence under effective penalty or threat, and injury to the transportation of the mails or interstate commerce being proven, the burden falls upon those making the demand or insistence to show lawful authority and good faith in its execution.

"Let me illustrate: Twelve carpenters are engaged in building a house. Aside from contract regulations, they each can quit at pleasure. A thirteenth and fourteenth man, strangers to them, by concerted threats of holding them up to public odium or private malice, induce them to quit, and leave the house unfinished. The latter in no sense represent the former or their wishes, but are simply interlopers for mischief, and are guilty of 'conspiracy against the employers of the carpenters. But if, upon a trial for such, it results that, instead of being strangers, they are the trustees, agents or leaders of the twelve, with full power to determine for them whether their wage is such that they ought to continue or quit, and that they have in good faith determined that question, they are not then, so far as the law goes, conspirators. But if it should further appear that the supposed authority was used, not in the interests of the twelve, but to further a personal ambition or malice of the two, it would no longer justify their conduct. Doing a thing under cloak of authority is not doing it with authority. The injury of the two to the employer, in such an instance, would only be aggravated by their treachery to the associated twelve, and both the employer and employes should, with equal insistence, ask for the visitation of the law.'

That a distinction is to be and is made between the mutual rights of employer and employe where a strike or lockout exists, on the one hand, and where neither strike nor lockout exists, on the other hand, is evidenced not only by the language of Judge Grosscup in the case of Iron Molders' Union No. 125 et al. v. Allis-Chalmers Company, 166 Fed. 52, 53, and from his language in his Charge to the Grand Jury, hereinbefore referred to (62 Fed. 831, 832, 833), but in Illinois by legislative enactment it was sought to divide employers arbitrarily into two classes, one class where a strike or lockout exists, and another class where no strike or lockout exists. Section 8 of the Act that was then in question before the Supreme Court of Illinois read—"In no case shall the superintendent of any free employment office created by this act furnish, or cause to be furnished, workmen > or other employes to any applicant for help whose employes are at that time on strike, or locked out; nor shall any list of names and addresses of applicants for employment be shown to any employer whose employes are on strike or locked out; nor shall such list be exposed where it can be copied or used by an employer whose employes are on strike or locked out."

And in deciding the Act invalid, the Court said that that section was a provision

> "in aid of strikes and strikers, whether right or wrong, and regardless of the justice or the propriety of the strike or lockout." See Mathews v. People (1903), 202 Ill. 389, 63 L. R. A. 73, 76, 78, 79.

Without undertaking to assign the reason for the difference as was done by the Court and by Judge Grosscup in deciding the case of Iron Molders' Union No. 125 et al v. Allis-Chalmers Company, 166 Fed. 45, Judge Goff in deciding the case of Mackall v. Ratchford et al. (C. C., D. West Virginia, 1897), 82 Fed. 41, 42, said with respect to the right of persuasion:

> "The strikers had the right to quit work themselves, and they had the right to induce other miners, by peaceable means, by the persuasive force of public or private argument exerted in a lawful way, to also quit work and join them."

In the case of Union Pacific Railway Company v. Ruef et al. (C. C., D. Nebraska, 1902), 120 Fed. 102, 114. Judge McPherson said:

> "Defendants have the right to argue or discuss with the new employes the question whether the new employes should work for the company. They have the right to persuade them if they can. But in presenting the matter they have no right to use force or violence. They have no right to terrorize or intimidate the new employes. The new employes have the right to come and go as they please, without fear or molestation, and without being compelled to discuss this or any other question, and without being guarded or picketed; and persistent and continued and objectionable persuasion by numbers is of itself intimidating and not allowable."

And it is to be remembered that persistent, continued and objectionable persuasion by one or by many as the United Mine Workers think best is what is sought to be legalized by these defendants.

In the same case, speaking of the right of freedom of contract between employer and employe, Judge McPherson held:

> "The law upholds and will protect the right of freedom of contract between employer and employe; the right of every person or corporation to hire and discharge men at pleasure, subject to liability for damages for breach of contract, and the right of every man to work or to quit work at his pleasure, subject to the same liability, making no distinction between union and non-union workmen."

In the same case (120 Fed. 113) Judge McPherson said:

> "The fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States provides that 'no person shall be deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law;' thereby meaning that neither congress nor any other governmental agency shall ever deprive any person of either liberty or property excepting by due process of law. And the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States provides that 'no state shall deprive any person of life, liberty or property without due process of law;

nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.' And the word 'person' means also a corporation, as many times decided by the United States Supreme Court.

"And that one's business is his or its property is likewise elementary, and is conceded by all. And that liberty means the right to do as he pleases, when he interferes with the rights of no other person, and the right to make contracts with all persons upon all subjects-matter, save and excepting with reference to immoral and unlawful matters, is also conceded by all who know anything of the propositions. And as to what the rights of property mean, and of what liberty of contract consists, of all that has been written upon these all-important and most vital questions there is no paper of greater ability, evidencing more learning, than the very recent opinion of the supreme court of Wisconsin in the case of State v. Kreutzberg, 90 N. W., 1098."

In Goldfield Consolidated Mines Company v. Goldfield Miners' Union No. 220, et al. (C. C., D. Nevada, 1908), 159 Fed., 500, 514, Judge Farrington said:

"It is a constitutional right of an employer to refuse to have business relations with any person or with any labor organization, and it is immaterial what his reasons are, whether good or bad, well or ill founded, or entirely trivial and whimsical."

On page 515 he further said:

"The right of master and servant to enter into contracts, to agree upon the terms and conditions under which the one will employ and the other will labor, is property."

And again on the same page he said:

"The right of an employer to refuse to employ any particular individual, or any class of individuals, is neither greater nor less than the right of a man to refuse to work for any particular individual, or class of individuals. The reason for the refusal can in no wise control, enlarge, or diminish the legal right of refusal, the right to employ, or the right to refuse to be employed."

And he quotes approvingly 2 Cooley on Torts, p. 587, as follows:

"It is a part of every man's civil right that he be left at liberty to refuse business relations with any person whomsoever, whether the refusal rests upon reason, or is the result of whim, caprice, prejudice, or malice. With his reasons neither the public nor third persons have any legal concern. It is also his right to have business relations with any one with whom he can make contracts."

And on the subject of persuasion, Judge Farrington said (page 519):

"Each party has the right to enter into lawful competition for the support of the non-union miners, and to endeavor by peaceful argument or persuasion to secure their co-operation, provided, the persuasion is of such a character as to leave the person solicited feeling free to do as he pleases, and he is not persuaded to do that which in him would be unlawful. This is so, because workmen, when free from contract obligations, have a legal right, singly, collectively, or as a union, to quit work; that is, to strike, and, having this right, they have the further right to use such lawful means to make the strike effective as are not inconsistent with the rights of others. Karges Furniture Co. v. Amalgamated Woodworkers' Union, 165 Ind., 421; 75 N. E., 877; 2 L. R. A. (N. S.), 788; 18 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. (2d Ed.), 88. The mining company has the right to employ non-union men to take the places vacated by those who quit work.

> The latter have no legal interest or concern in the contract between the company and its new employes. The places which they vacated to strike are no longer theirs, and never again will be theirs unless they are re-employed. It is difficult to see, when a man has voluntarily given up a job, how he can maintain that he has a shadow of claim or right to the vacated place. Union Pac. R. Co. v. Ruef (C. C.), 120 Fed., 102, 128."

We call attention to Judge Farrington's language that where the relationship of employer and employe has been finally terminated, the striker has nothing to do with the contract the employer may make with his new employe. The Allis-Chalmers Company case (166 Fed., 45) deals with the rights of strikers, and the right of the strikers to use persuasion is permitted by Judge Grosscup owing to the anomalous relationship still existing between the employer and the employe, resultant upon a pending strike. Judge Grosscup himself, however, recognizes that the striker's right to persuade ceases when the striker finally terminates his relationship with his employer.

In Adams v. Brenan, et al. (1895), 157 Ill., 194; 42 L. R. A., 718, the Supreme Court of Illinois held:

> "A provision that none but union labor shall be employed cannot be lawfully made in a contract by a public corporation, such as a board of education, as it constitutes a discrimination between different classes of citizens, and is of such a nature as to restrict competition and to increase the cost of the work."

Per contra: Only non union labor could not be so employed.

And Judge Cartwright, in delivering the opinion of the Court in that case, said:

> "No question concerning the merits of labor or trades unions is in any way involved in this case. The right of organization for mutual benefit in all > lawful ways is not denied. The question is whether the board of education has a right to enter into a combination with such an organization for the expenditure of the taxpayers' money for the benefit of members of the organization, and to exclude any portion of the citizens following lawful trades and occupations from the right to labor. It has no such right."

Per contra: A like contract to employ only non-union men is lawful.

But the labor union itself would be unlawful if as a combination it extends so far as to inflict injury upon others, or to oppress and crush them by excluding them from all employment, unless gained through joining the labor organization or trades union. Id. 2. L. R. A. (N. S.) 294. And if such a labor union, rendered unlawful for such reasons, were to become subject to the Anti-Trust Law owing to its interference with interstate commerce engaged in by employers with whom the union might be strong enough to compel a contract for the employment of necessary labor whereby to enable the employer to embark in business, or if already in business, then to enable him to continue therein, any such contract to employ only members of that particular union would be unlawful and could not be enforced under the authority of the case of Continental Wall Paper Company v. Louis Voight & Sons Company, decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, February 1, 1909, 212 U. S., 227, 53 L. Ed., 486, 29 S. C., 280.

In the case of State of Missouri v. Julow (1895), 129 Mo., 163, 31 S. W. 781, 29 L. R. A. 257, the Supreme Court of Missouri decided that a right to insist that employees shall withdraw from or refrain from joining any trade union or labor union as a condition of employment or continued employment, is within the constitutional rights of an employer.

In the case of Gillepsie v. People of the State of Illinois (1900), 188 Ill. 176, 52 L. R. A. 283, the Supreme Court held a statute void which made it unlawful to prevent or attempt to prevent, an employee from joining any lawful labor organization, or to discharge an employe because of his connection with such an organization, and providing a penalty therefor, since the right to terminate a contract, subject to liability to respond in a civil action for an unwarranted termination, is within the protection of the provisions of the State and Federal Constitutions, which guarantee that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law. The Court held that there was an unconstitutional discrimination in favor of union workmen.

In the case of State v. Kreutzberg (1902), 114 Wis. 530, 90 N. W. 1098, 58 L. R. A. 748, the Supreme Court of Wisconsin held that a statute forbidding, under penalty, an employer from discharging an employe because he is a member of a labor organization, violates the constitutional guaranty of liberty.

Speaking of the constitutional rights of life, liberty and property, Judge Dodge, delivering the opinion of the Court, said (58 L. R. A. 753, 754):

> "Free will in making private contracts and even in greater degree in refusing to make them, is one of the most important and sacred of the individual rights intended to be protected. That the present act curtails it directly, seriously, and prejudicially, cannot be doubted. The success in life of the employer depends on the efficiency, fidelity, and loyalty of his employes. Without enlarging upon or debating the relative advantages or disadvantages of the labor union, either to its members or to the community at large, it is axiomatic that an employer cannot have undivided fidelity, loyalty and devotion to his interests from an employe who has given to an association right to control his conduct. He may by its decisions be required to limit the amount of his daily product. He may be restrained from teaching his art to others. He may be forbidden to work in association with other men whose service the employer desires. He may not be at liberty to work with such machines or upon such materials or products as the employer deems essential to his success. In all these respects he may be disabled from the full degree of usefulness attributable to the same abilities in another who had not yielded up to an association any right to restrain his freedom of will and exertion in his employer's behalf according to the latter's wishes. Such considerations an employer has a right to deem valid reasons for preferring not to jeopardize his success by employing members of organizations. A man who has by agreement or otherwise shackled any of his faculties—even his freedom of will—may well be considered less useful or less desirable by some employers than if free and untrammeled. Whether the workman can find in his membership in such organizations advantages and compensations to offset his lessened desirability in the industrial market is a question each must decide for himself. His right to freedom in so doing is of the same grade and sacredness as that of the employer to consent or refuse to employ him according to the decision he makes. We must not forget that our government is founded on the idea of equality of all individuals before the law. Such restraints as may be placed on one may be placed on another. If the liberty of the employer to contract or refuse to contract may be denied, so may that of the employe. In answering the question now before us, we may not forget the possibility of being called on to answer whether the legislature may make a criminal of the employe who quits, for example, because his employer joins a blacklisting association; because non-union men or members of some other union are employed, or non-union or forbidden machines or materials are used; because of an obnoxious foreman; because excessive hours of work are required; because compelled to trade at employer's store or board at his boarding house; or because of any other fact or conduct now considered entirely adequate reason for refusing or leaving a particular service. It must not be forgotten, if, as counsel for the state argues, the laborer is too weak to meet the employer on equal terms in the field of contract, that he will be far more subject to the latter's control and oppression in the field of politics, and that laws of the above character will surely come, if within the proper province of the legislature, unless, as we have faith to believe, the character and the individuality of the wage earners of the country are sufficient to maintain their independence—both contractual and political—in a field of equal rights under the law, and of full liberty to each to sell and buy labor to and from whom he will."

In the case of Coffeyville Vitrified Brick & Tile Company v. Perry (1904), 69 Kan. 297, 76 Pac. 848, 66 L. R. A. 185, 187, 188, the Supreme Court of Kansas held that a statute which makes it unlawful to discharge an employe because he belongs to a lawful labor organization, and which provides for the recovery of damages for such discharge, is void. The right to terminate a contract is within the protection of the State and Federal Constitutions, which guarantee to every citizen the protection of life, liberty, and property.

The Coffeyville Vitrified Brick & Tile Company was a corporation engaged in manufacturing brick. It discharged Perry, one of its employes, and he brought suit under the statute. He claimed he had been discharged because he was a member of a labor organization. In holding the statute unconstitutional, Judge Greene, who delivered the opinion of the Court, said:

> "The right to follow any lawful vocation, and to make contracts, is as completely within the protection of the Constitution as the right to hold property free from unwarranted seizure, or the liberty to go when and where one will. One of the ways of obtaining property is by contract. The right, therefore, to contract cannot be infringed by the legislature without violating the letter and spirit of the Constitution. Every citizen is protected in his right to work where and for whom he will; he may not only select his employer, but his associates. He is at liberty to refuse to continue to serve one who has in his employ a person, or an association of persons, objectionable to him. In this respect the rights of the employer and the employe are equal. Any act of the legislature that would undertake to impose on an employer the obligation of keeping one in his service whom, for any reason, he does not desire, would be a denial of his constitutional right to make and terminate contracts and to acquire and hold property. Equally so would be an act the provisions of which were intended to require one to remain in the service of another whom he did not desire to serve."

Judge Green also said:

> "The business conducted by the defendant was its property, and in the exercise of this ownership it is protected by the Constitution. It could abandon or discontinue its operation at pleasure. It had > the right, beyond the possibility of legislative interference, to make any contract with reference thereto not in violation of law. In the operation of its property it may employ such persons as are desirable, and discharge without reason those who are undesirable. It is at liberty to contract for the services of persons in any manner that is satisfactory to both. No legislative restrictions can be imposed upon the lawful exercise of these rights."

In the case of People of the State of New York v. Marcus (1906), 185 N. Y. 257, 77 N. E. 1073, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 282, the New York Court of Appeals decided that a statute forbidding an employer to exact an agreement from an employe not to join a labor union infringes his constitutional rights of liberty.

Per contra: To exact an agreement not to join a union is lawful.

And a fortiori, to join a particular union which is hostile to the employer.

In the case of Delz v. Winfree (1891), 80 Texas 400, 26 Am. St. Rep. 755, the Supreme Court of Texas held:

> "The absolute right of a person to refuse to have business relations with any person whomsoever, whether the refusal is based upon reason or is the result of whim, caprice, prejudice, or malice, must be limited to the individual action of the party who asserts the right. It is not equally true that one person may from such motives influence another person to do the same thing."

In the case of State v. Glidden (1887), 55 Conn. 46, 8 Atl. 890, 3 Am. St. Rep. 23, "An information alleged that the defendants conspired to threaten and use means (the boycott) to intimidate the Carrington Publishing Company, to compel it, against its will, to abstain from doing an act (to keep in its employ workmen of its own choice) which it had a legal right to do, and to do an act (employ the defendants and such persons as they should name) which it had a legal right to abstain from doing: held, that, looking at the transaction as it appeared on the face of the information, the defendants' purpose was to deprive the publishing company of its liberty to carry on its business in its own way, although in doing so it interfered with no right of the defendants; the motive was to gain an advantage unjustly and at the expense of others, and therefore the act was legally corrupt; and as a means of accomplishing the purpose, the parties intended to harm the publishing company, and therefore it was malicious."

In the case of O'Brien v. People (1905), 216 Ill. 354, 75 N. E. 108, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 966, 108 Am. St. Rep. 219, 220, 221, the Supreme Court of Illinois held that:

> "No person or combination of persons can legally, by direct or indirect means, obstruct or interfere with another in the conduct of his lawful business, and any attempt to compel an individual, firm or corporation to execute an agreement to conduct his business through certain agencies, or by a particular class of employes is not only unlawful and actionable, but is also an interference with the exercise of the highest civil right."

And it was also held in that case that "An attempt to coerce a person to sign an agreement to conduct his business by employing only members of a labor union, under a threat of ordering a strike, is unlawful, and such an agreement is voidable for duress, and is violative of the legal rights of both the employer and the non-union employe." And "The right to enter into contracts for labor, or to labor, is both a liberty, and a property right."

Now a labor union may force itself upon a non-union employer in several ways. It may resort to the primary boycott, or to the secondary boycott. And either the primary or the secondary boycott may be of the non-union product. If, of a coal operator, the primary boycott of the product is attempted, it would be of little avail as a coercive measure because the individual consumer of coal is a small factor. For like reason, a secondary boycott of the coal would be ineffective. But the primary boycott through the coal operator's labor supply is entirely possible if all men can be gotten to join the Union. Much more so may the secondary boycott be made effective through the coal operator's labor supply, for in such case, while the Union's membership and power may not be at high tide throughout the entire country, or in its greatest field of its endeavor, it might be all powerful in the particular locality where the recalcitrant operator is located. Therefore, the United Mine Workers of America seek to have, and to require, all men working in or around every mine to join their Union, for a monopoly of supply makes the primary as well as the secondary boycott possible, inasmuch as the scale must then be signed with the Union. So, inducing non-union men to join the Union illustrates that situation in the creation of monopolies where the doing of an act, otherwise lawful, becomes unlawful because done to promote an unlawful end. Note the significance of the following provisions:

> "One of the objects of this organization is to unite all employees in and around the coal mines of Ohio and the Panhandle District of West Virginia."—Section 2 of Article I, Constitution of District No. 6, United Mine Workers of America.
> "All men are eligible and must be members of the United Mine Workers of America who work in and around the mines."—Section 3 of Article I, Constitution of Sub-District 5 of District 6, United Mine Workers of America.

"As the mine workers of the entire country are competitors in the labor world, I promise to cease work at any time I am called upon by the organization to do so."—Obligation of Membership, United Mine Workers of America.

But to effectuate the secondary boycott through plaintiff's labor supply, the United Mine Workers must get, not only all men to join the Union, but with all men must be included plaintiff's employes. In getting plaintiff's employes to join the Union, the defendants must interfere with the contractual relations existing between plaintiff and its employes, which forbid the men joining that Union. Hence, a double wrong is done in the present effort of the United Mine Workers to force themselves into contractual relations with plaintiff, which does not want, and has repeatedly refused to have, anything whatever to do with them.

In the case of Martell v. White, et al. (1904), 185 Mass. 255, 69 N. E. 1085, 64 L. R. A. 260, 262, the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts held that an action will lie on behalf of a quarry owner against members of a voluntary association of dealers in stone of which he is not a member who enforce a by-law of the association imposing a fine upon members who deal with those who are not members, so that members who desire to deal with non-members are coerced from doing so, to the ruination of the business of the quarry owner.

In deciding this case, Judge Hammond, who delivered the opinion of the Court, said

"It is elemental that the unlawfulness of a conspiracy may be found either in the end sought, or the means to be used. If either is unlawful, within the meaning of the term as applied to the subject, then the conspiracy is unlawful. It becomes necessary, therefore, to examine into the nature of the conspiracy in this case, both as to the object sought and the means used."

"The case presents one phase of a general subject which gravely concerns the interests of the business world, and, indeed, those of all organized society, and which in recent years has demanded and received great consideration in the Courts and elsewhere. Much remains to be done to clear the atmosphere, but some things, at least, appear to have been settled; and certainly at this stage of the judicial inquiry it cannot be necessary to enter upon a course of reasoning or to cite authorities in support of the proposition that, while a person must submit to competition, he has the right to be protected from malicious interference with his business."

In another place, Judge Hammond said:

"The justification must be as broad as the act, and must cover, not only the motive and the purpose, or, in other words, the object sought, but also the means used.

"The defendants contend that, both as to object and means, they are justified by the law applicable to business competition. In considering this defense it is to be remembered, as was said by Bowen, L. J., in Mogul S. S. Co. v. McGregor, L. R. 23 Q. B. Div. 598, 611, that there is presented 'an apparent conflict or antinomy between two rights that are equally regarded by the law,—the right of the plaintiffs to be protected in the legitimate exercise of their trade, and the right of the defendants to carry on their business as seems best to them, provided they commit no wrong to others.' Here, as in most cases where there is a conflict between two important principles, either of which is sound, and to be sustained within proper bounds, but each of which must finally yield, to some extent, to the other, it frequently is not possible by a general formula to mark out the dividing line with reference to every conceivable case, and it is not wise to attempt it. The best and only practicable course is to consider the cases as they arise, and, bearing in mind the grounds upon which the soundness of each principle is supposed to rest, by a process of elimination and comparison to establish points through which, at least, the line must run, and beyond which the party charged with trespass shall not be allowed to go."

The case of Swift & Company, et al. v. United States (1905), 196 U. S. 375, 49 L. ed. 518, 524, 25 S. C. 276, illustrates the use of expedients lawful in themselves, which become unlawful by reason of the thing to be accomplished. Swift & Company et al., controlled about six-tenths of the whole trade and commerce in fresh meats among the states, territories, and District of Columbia, and, but for the acts charged would have been in free competition with one another. In order to restrain competition among themselves as to the purchase of live stock, defendants required their respective purchasing agents at the stock yards to refrain from bidding against each other, except perfunctorily and without good faith. By this means they compelled the owners of stock to sell at less prices than they would have received if the bidding had been really competitive. And to induce stock owners in other states to make large shipments to the stock yards, they, the defendants, combined to bid up, through their agents, the prices of live stock for a few days at a time, so that the market reports would show prices much higher than the state of the trade would warrant. Following such a maneuver, the stock owners would send in their stock and then the defendants would apply the other rule and the buyers would bid only perfunctorily and without good faith, and the stock would then be bought in at much less prices than it would otherwise have brought had the bidding really been competitive.

The act of the bidding whether high or low was within the right of each defendant, but the wrongfulness consisted in the use to which that right was put. It was contended that such a scheme was within the law against unlawful restraints of trade and monopolies, and Mr. Justice Holmes, delivering the opinion of the Court, said:

> "The scheme as a whole seems to us to be within reach of the law. The constituent elements, as we have stated them, are enough to give to the scheme a body and, for all that we can say, to accomplish it. Moreover, whatever we may think of them separately, when we take them up as distinct charges they are alleged sufficiently as elements of the scheme. It is suggested that the several acts charged are lawful, and that intent can make no difference. But they are bound together as the parts of a single plan. The plan may make the parts unlawful. Aiken v. Wisconsin, 195 U. S. 194, 206, ante, 154, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 3. The statute gives this proceeding against combinations in restraint of commerce among the states and against attempts to monopolize the same. Intent is almost essential to such a combination, and is essential to such an attempt. Where acts are not sufficient in themselves to produce a result which the law seeks to prevent,—for instance, the monopoly,—but require further acts in addition to the mere forces of nature to bring that result to pass, an intent to bring it to pass is necessary in order to produce a dangerous probability that it will happen. Com. v. Peaslee, 177 Mass. 267, 272, 59 N. E. 55. But when that intent and the consequent dangerous probability exist, this statute, like many others, and like the common law in some cases, directs itself against that dangerous probability as well as against the completed result."

(2) b. 2 y. PLAINTIFF'S AFFIRMATIVE RIGHTS WHICH EXPLAIN, LIMIT, OR MODIFY DEFENDANTS' RIGHTS.

Inducing or procuring another to break his contract is an actionable wrong unless there be sufficient justification for the interference.

On this point, we call the Court's attention to the following cases:

Simpson's Cases on Torts, 1908, p. 329.

Lumley was the lessee and manager of the Queen's Theater in London, and he contracted with Johanna Wagner to perform in his theater for a certain time, with a condition, amongst others, that she should not sing nor use her talents elsewhere during the term without plaintiff's consent in writing; yet the defendant knowing of this, and while the agreement was in force and before the expiration of the term enticed and procured Wagner to refuse to perform; by means of which enticement and procurement, Wagner wrongfully refused to perform and did not perform during the term.

The above constitutes the substance of the first two counts of the declaration. The third count differs from the first two, in that it sets out that Wagner was really performing in the theater for reward to her, and that the defendant had maliciously procured her to depart out of plaintiff's employment, whereby she did depart out of the employment and service of plaintiff, whereby damage was suffered by the plaintiff.

Each count in the declaration alleged special damage. There was a demurrer and joinder. The Court in Lumley v. Gye laid down this rule:

> "Where there is a contract between two persons for exclusive personal service to be rendered by the one to the other, an action lies against a third person (not a party to the contract, who intentionally induces the former party to break his contract so as to cause, as the natural consequence of the breach, loss to the other."

An effort was made in Lumley v. Gye to show that the proposition laid down by the Court would not apply, because it was claimed that the relation of master and servant in the strict sense did not exist between plaintiff and Wagner, and that the law as to enticing servants was contrary to the general rule and principle of law, and anomalous, and probably had its origin from the state of society when serfdom existed, and was founded upon, or upon the equity of, the Statute of Laborers.

The Court rejected that contention, and announced the rule above stated.

Bowen v. Hall (1891). 6 Q. B. D. 333. (s. c. 50 L. J. Q. B. 305). 1 E. R. C. 717, Id. ed.

Bowen carried on the business of brickmaker, near Stourbridge, England. He made a contract with one of the defendants, Pearson by name, under which Pearson agreed and undertook, for the consideration of certain prices named in the contract, to find all labor for the whole manufacture in a workman-like manner, of best quality white-glazed bricks and baths (with exception of hooping the baths and preparing the clay mass) in such quantities as Bowen might require, and when Bowen might require, and to deliver anywhere they might be required on plaintiff's premises, the quality to be equal to sample supplied, and the prices to be subject to the standard prices of the trade for the manufacture of the same.

The contract contains a somewhat extended scale, covering the different articles of manufacture.

Pearson agreed not to engage himself to any one else for a term of five years, and Bowen, on his part, agreed not to engage any one else for the same work for a term of five years.

It will be noticed that the contract for five years on the part of Pearson and Bowen was negative in each instance.

Pearson did not agree to work for Bowen for five years. He only agreed not to work for any one else for a term of five years. Bowen did not agree to employ Pearson for five years. He only agreed that he would not engage any one else for the same work for a term of five years. The contract bore date June 18, 1877, and in May, 1878, the defendants, Hall and Fletcher, Fletcher being Hall's manager, wrongfully induced Pearson, contrary to his agreement with plaintiff, to depart from the exclusive service of plaintiff, and to manufacture on account of the defendant Hall glazed bricks and baths such as he had contracted to manufacture for the plaintiff.

Plaintiff sued Hall and Fletcher for damages, and claimed an injunction to restrain them from employing Pearson, and also claimed an injunction to restrain Pearson from engaging himself to Hall and Fletcher until the expiration of his contract of service with plaintiff.

It was held that the doctrine announced in Lumley v. Gye, supra, applied, and that an action would lie against the defendants, Hall and Fletcher, for wrongfully enticing away and keeping the other defendant, Pearson, from plaintiff's employment, and for wrongfully receiving and harboring him after notice of his being the servant of the plaintiff, and as against the said defendant Pearson for unlawfully and against the will of the plaintiff departing from the service of the plaintiff.

The Court was of the opinion that the act of the defendants was done with knowledge of the contract between the plaintiff and Pearson; was done in order to obtain an advantage for one of the defendants at the expense of the plaintiff; was done from a wrong motive, and would, therefore, justify a finding that it was done in that sense maliciously.

Temperton v. Russell. 1. Q. B. (1893) 715.

The defendants were members of a joint committee of three trade unions connected with the building trade in Hull. A firm of builders there having refused to obey certain rules laid down by the unions with regard to building operations, the unions sought to compel them to do so, by preventing the supply of building materials to them. In pursuance of this object, they requested the plaintiff, a master mason and builder in Hull, who supplied building materials to the firm, to cease to supply them with such materials, but the plaintiff refused to do so. Thereupon, with the object of injuring the plaintiff in his business, in order to compel him to comply with such request, the defendants induced persons who, to the knowledge of the defendants, had entered into contracts with the plaintiff for the supply of materials, to break their contracts, and not to enter into further contracts with the plaintiff, by threatening that the workmen would be withdrawn from their employ. The plaintiff sustained damage in consequence of such breaches of contract, and of the refusal of such persons to enter into contracts with him: Held, that an action was maintainable by the plaintiff against the defendants for maliciously procuring such breaches of contract, and also for maliciously conspiring together to injure him by preventing persons from entering into contracts with him.

The right of action for maliciously procuring a breach of contract is not confined to contracts in the nature of contracts of personal service.

Simpson's Cases on Torts, 1908, 362.

The action in Quinn v. Leathem was originally brought in the High Court in Ireland by Leathem, the respondent, as plaintiff, against Quinn and four other persons, to recover damages for a wrongful interference with the plaintiff's business of a butcher at Lisburn, a few miles from Belfast. For upward of twenty years before July, 1895, Leathem had carried on business in Lisburn, having as one of his constant customers, Andrew Munce, who kept a butcher's shop at Belfast, to whom he supplied weekly £20 or £30 worth of the best meat; and he had in his employ as assistants several men at weekly wages.

The Belfast Journeymen Butchers' and Assistants' Association was formed in 1893. Leathem was not a member, nor were any of his assistants. The members of the union adopted a rule that they would not work with non-union men, and would not cut up meat that came from a place where non-union hands were employed. Prior to 1895, there had been no controversy with Leathem, but in July, 1895, Leathem was invited to attend a meeting of the union which was held at Lisburn. The defendants were there.

Leathem was notified that he must run his shop union, and must quit employing non-union labor, and that if he did not do so, the men employed by Munce, to whom Leathem had been selling meat, would be called out.

In addition to this, the Union persuaded some of Leathem's men to join the Union and quit working for Leathem. This was done in order to try to inconvenience Leathem and compel him to unionize his place of business.

Leathem brought suit, and on appeal the following was held:

> "A conspiracy to injure, if there be damage, gives rise to civil liability; and an oppressive combination differs widely from an invasion of civil rights by a single person. It is a violation of right to interfere with contractual relations recognized by law if there be no justification for the interference. This principle cannot be confined to inducements to break contracts of service. If such wrongful interference with a man's liberty of action is intended to injure and, in fact, damages a third person, such third person has a remedy by an action.
> "Annoyance and coercion by many may be actionable where like conduct on the part of one person would not be so.
> "The appellant, an officer of a trade union, in combination with other members of the Union—first, induced a servant of the respondent to break his contract with the respondent; secondly, induced a customer of the respondent, by threats of calling out the customer's men, to withdraw his custom, and thirdly, induced the respondent's servants to leave his service: Held, that the appellant had been guilty of an actionable conspiracy for which he was liable in damages, and that, as there was no 'trade dispute' within the meaning of the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875, s. 3, the appellant was not entitled to the benefit of that section."

South Wales Miners' Federation v. Glamorgan Coal Company (1905). A. C. 239. 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 436.

Simpson's Cases on Torts, 1908, 342.

The Glamorgan Coal Company and seventy-three other plaintiffs, owners of collieries in South Wales, brought this action against the South Wales Miners' Federation for inducing workmen in the collieries to break their contracts of service with the plaintiffs, and alternatively for wrongfully and maliciously conspiring to do so. By the terms of employment, the wages were paid upon a sliding-scale agreement, rising and falling with the price of coal. In November, 1900, the Federation fearing that the price of coal would be reduced and wages, therefore, lowered, resolved to order a "stop-day" on November 9, 1900, and informed the workmen. The order was obeyed by over 100,000 men, who took a holiday and thereby broke their contracts of service. At a conference held on November 12, 1900, between delegates of the men and the council, a resolution was passed authorizing the council to declare a general holiday at any time they might think it necessary for the protection of wages and for the industry generally. In October and November, 1901, the council ordered four stop-days for the same reason as before, and the men took a holiday on each of those days in breach of their contracts. The lower Court found that the action of the Federation was dictated by an honest desire to forward the interest of the workmen, and was not in any sense prompted by a wish to injure the masters, between whom and the men there was no quarrel or ill-will, and that there was justification or excuse for what the defendants did, and judgment was given for the defendants.

In the House of Lords, the Earl of Halsbury, Lord Chancellor, said:

> "I cannot think that in this case there is anything to be determined except the question of fact. I say so because the questions of law discussed are so well settled by authority, and by authority in this House.

"To combine to procure a number of persons to break contracts is manifestly unlawful. This is found as a fact to have been done here, and is also found to have caused serious damage to the persons who were entitled to have these contracts performed."

And the following was held:

"To interfere with contractual relations recognized by law, as by inducing and procuring another to break his contract, is an actionable wrong unless there be sufficient justification for the interference.

"Thus, the officers and executive council of a federation of miners are liable in damages for procuring the members of the federation to stop work on certain days in breach of their contracts of employment and without notice to their employers, it being no defense that the wrong thus committed was done without malice or ill-will towards the employers, and for the sole purpose of keeping up the price of coal and the wages of the miners."

Angle v. Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis and Omaha R. Co., (1894). 151 U. S. 1. 38 L. ed. 55. 14 S. C. 240.

Angle, plaintiff's intestate, was a railroad contractor, and had contracted to do certain work in constructing the line of the Chicago, Portage and Superior Railway Company, which had certain land granted to it, said to be worth about $4,000,000. The Chicago, St. P., M. & O. R. Co. wanted to stop the construction of the Chicago, Portage and Superior Railway Company and to acquire the land which had been granted. While Angle was prosecuting his work in building the line, and had 1,600 men employed, and the completion of the line on or before May 5, 1882, was an assured fact, unless Angle was interfered with, the defendant company conspired with other parties to wrest the land grant from the Chicago, Portage and Superior Railway Company, and to that end prevent the completion of the contract by Angle and the construction of the road. The Chicago, St. P., M. & O. R. Co. got control of the stock of the Chicago, Portage and Superior Railway Company, and then notified the engineers and Angle that the company had been sold out, and advised them to protect themselves, because the company could not pay or protect them. As a result the several engineering corps were broken up, the engineers left the work, all the tools, material and other personal property belonging to the contractor and to the company were attached at suit of the merchant creditors, and the 1,600 laborers dispersed and went elsewhere for work.

Following that, the Chicago, St. P., M. & O. R. Co., and those it conspired with succeeded in getting the Legislature of Wisconsin to pass an act forfeiting and revoking the land grant to the Chicago, Portage and Superior Railway Company and bestow it on the Chicago, St. P., M. & O. R. Co.

After the contract with Angle was thus broken, he commenced an action at law against the Chicago, Portage and Superior Railway Company. He died while the suit was pending, and suit was revived in the name of his administratrix. The plaintiff recovered judgment in that suit for more than $200,000.00, an execution was issued and returned nulla bona, and thereupon the bill in this case was filed to reach the land grant in the hands of the Chicago, St. P., M. & O. R. Co.

This Court held:

And further held that the defendant company had wrongfully interfered and brought about a breach of the contract which Angle had with the Chicago, Portage and Superior Railway Company, and that the land which the Portage Company first had, and which had been secured by the Omaha Company was liable for the judgment which had been obtained against the Chicago, Portage and Superior Railway Company.

The Court in announcing the above doctrine based its conclusion in part upon the decisions in the cases of Lumley v. Gye, supra, Bowen v. Hall, supra, and Walker v. Cronin, 107 Mass. 555, in which latter case a manufacturer was held entitled to maintain an action against a third party, who, with the unlawful purpose of preventing him from carrying on his business, wilfully induced many of his employes to leave his employment, whereby the manufacturer lost their services, and the profits and advantages which he would have derived therefrom.

Bitterman was engaged in the business of scalping railroad tickets. The Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company issued non-transferable excursion tickets at reduced rates. Bitterman, with knowledge of their non-transferability, bought up tickets and resold them. The purchaser, when required to identify himself, personated the original purchaser, and the Railroad Company was deprived of the additional revenue it would have obtained had the second purchaser purchased a full rate ticket, as he doubtless would have done had it not been for Bitterman's scalping business.

The railroad had given notice of its intention to issue a certain excursion reduced rate ticket, and in order to stop Bitterman from scalping those tickets it applied to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana for an injunction.

The Supreme Court of the United States held on appeal that, carrying on the business of purchasing and selling non-transferable reduced-rate excursion railroad tickets for profit, to the injury of the Railroad Company issuing such tickets, is an actionable wrong, although actual malice in the sense of personal ill will may not exist.

And Mr. Justice White, in deciding the case, referred to and approved the doctrine announced in the case of Angle v. Chicago, St. P., M. & O. R. Co., supra, that an actionable wrong is committed by one "who maliciously interferes in a contract between two parties, and induces one of them to break that contract, to the injury of the other."

Mr. Justice White said:

> "We deem it unnecessary to restate the grounds upon which the ruling in the Angle case was rested, or to trace the evolution of the principle in that case announced, because of the consideration given to the subject in the Angle case, and the full reference to the authorities which was made in the opinion in that case."

West Virginia Transportation Company v. Standard Oil Company (1900). 50 W. Va. 611. 40 S. E. 491. 56 L. R. A. 804. 88 Am. St. Rep. 895.

The West Virginia Transportation Company was engaged in transporting petroleum oil by means of pipe lines and tank cars from Volcano and vicinity to Parkersburg, and in storing oil, and had expended $300,000.00 in acquiring lands, rights of way, etc., and had built up a large business. The Standard Oil Company determined to force the West Virginia Transportation Company out of business, and thereupon conspired with the West Virginia Oil Company to prevent the West Virginia Transportation Company from continuing its business, and from transporting oil through its pipe lines by means of its tank cars and from storing oil. The West Virginia Oil Company was organized to purchase and operate what was known as the property of the West Virginia Oil and Land Company, a territory which was served by plaintiff's pipe lines, and from which it had transported oil for compensation for several years. The Standard Oil Company acquired stock in the West Virginia Oil Company and dictated its management. The Standard Oil Company caused the construction of the Eureka Pipe Line to serve the same territory. As a result the business of the plaintiff was ruined. In holding the Standard Oil Company liable for the damage, the Court held:

> "If one wantonly and maliciously, whether for his own benefit or not, induce a person to violate his contract with a third person to the injury of that third person, it is actionable."

The Thacker Coal & Coke Company engaged in mining coal in West Virginia, brought suit in the Circuit Court of Mingo County against Burke and others, representing the United Mine Workers of America, for enticing the company's servants from the company's service. The Thacker Coal & Coke Company was running non-union, and the purpose of the defendants was to require the company to run its mine union. In the lower Court the declaration upon demurrer was dismissed, and the company sued out a writ of error. The Supreme Court reversed the lower Court, and held:

> "(1) One who maliciously entices a servant in actual service of a master to desert and quit his service is liable to action therefor; (2) If one wantonly and maliciously, whether for his own benefit or not, induces a person to violate his contract with a third person to the injury of that third person, it is actionable: (3) Persons who conspire to induce others to break a valid contract between other persons are liable to action therefor."

Simpson's Cases on Torts, 1908, 334.

The plaintiff made a contract with the Jamestown Hotel Corporation which had a hotel known as the "Inside Inn," and was the only hotel inside of the Exposition grounds. The plaintiff was the proprietor of a tourist agency at Boston. By the contract between the plaintiff and the Hotel Corporation, plaintiff agreed to represent the Hotel Corporation throughout the New England States, to establish sub-agencies in that territory, and to use every possible endeavor to book persons for the Inside Inn. The plaintiff was made the exclusive agent in the territory mentioned and was to receive twenty-five cents for each person sent by him to the hotel. The plaintiff advertised the hotel and gave descriptions of the Jamestown Exposition and of the Inside Inn, and followed that with a statement that he was the exclusive representative of the Inn.

The defendant was a ticket and tourist agent at Boston. He wished to obtain the same rights to represent the Inside Inn in the same territory that the plaintiff had obtained. As a result of his representations to the Hotel Company, that company gave the defendant the right to represent it just the same as the plaintiff was entitled to do, and in the same territory in which it had granted to plaintiff the exclusive privilege. As a result, plaintiff suffered loss. Plaintiff brought suit against the defendant, alleging that he had unlawfully interfered and brought about a breach of plaintiff's contract with the Hotel Company. An injunction was prayed for and granted.

The Supreme Court of Massachusetts held that the plaintiff was entitled to an injunction against the defendant, restraining the defendant from directly or indirectly acting as agent of the hotel corporation within the New England States, and from preventing, or seeking to prevent, directly or indirectly, the plaintiff from acting as exclusive agent of the hotel corporation for that territory.

The Court announced the following doctrines:

> "The right of competition does not justify one in inducing a hotel company to break its contract to make another its exclusive agent, and divide the agency with the one offering the inducement" and "Equity will enjoin interference with one's rights under a contract, where it is shown that damages will not afford an adequate remedy."

Labor Unions are not exempt, for the reason that they are Labor Unions, from the application of the law against tortious interference with the contractual relation of others.

On this point, we ask the Court's attention to the following cases:

> Read v. Friendly Society of Operative Stone Masons of England, Ireland, and Wales, (1902). 2 K. B. 88.

Read, the plaintiff, (who was the son of a mason, a member of the defendant society), being a man of twenty-five years of age, and desirous of improving his capacity to earn wages, entered into an agreement with Wigg & Wright, by whom he had been previously employed as laborer, whereby he covenanted to serve them for three years at the wages of 15 s. a week, which were ordinary laborers' wages; and they in return covenanted to teach and instruct him in the trade or business of stone and marble masons. Wigg & Wright and their employes were members of the defendant society. The defendant society had a rule that boys entering the trade shall not work more than three months without being legally bound apprentice, and in no case to be more than sixteen years of age, except masons' sons and stepsons, and that employers could have one apprentice to every four masons on an average. Read entered the service of Wigg & Wright, according to his agreement and was working for them at the rate of wages specified, when the union objected to Read being apprenticed, and claimed that he was over sixteen years of age, and that the language of their rule with regard to masons' sons did not apply to Read. The union demanded Read's discharge. The union protested against Wigg & Wright introducing individuals not in the trade, and empowered their members working for the firm of Wigg & Wright to take prompt action in the matter. It was admitted that prompt action meant that the defendants would authorize their members to give two hours' notice to quit Wigg & Wright's service. As a result, the plaintiff was not taught his trade owing to the action taken by the defendants. The defense made was that the defendants acted for the best interests of their society, and that they were not actuated by any improper motives, but had honestly endeavored to enforce their construction of the rule referred to. The lower court gave judgment for the defendants, and the plaintiff appealed.

In reversing the lower court and holding the defendants liable for causing Wigg & Wright to break their contract with the plaintiff, the Court said:

> "I think the plaintiff has a cause of action against the defendants, unless the Court is satisfied that, when they interfered with the contractual rights of plaintiff, the defendants had a sufficient justification for their interference—to use Lord Macnaghten's words. This sufficient justification they may have had, and they may prove it; but the facts found by the county court judge and relied on by him as enough do not amount to one; for it is not a justification that 'they acted bona fide in the best interests of the society of masons,' i. e., in their own interests. Nor is it enough that 'they were not actuated by improper motives.' I think their sufficient justification for interference with plaintiff's right must be an equal or superior right in themselves, and that no one can legally excuse himself to a man, of whose contract he has procured the breach, on the ground that he acted on a wrong understanding of his own rights, or without malice, or bona fide, or in the best interests of himself, nor even that he acted as an altruist, seeking only the good of another and careless of his own advantage."

And the syllabus of that case reads, as follows:

> "The justification which will be sufficient to exonerate a person from liability for his interference with the contractual rights of another must be an equal or superior right in himself, and it will not be sufficient for him to show that he acted bona fide or without malice, or in the best interests of himself or others, or on a wrong understanding of his own rights."

road Company v. Bitterman et al., (1906). 75 C. C. A. 192, 203. 144 Fed. 34, 45.

In deciding this case the Circuit Court of Appeals quoted from Angle v. Chicago, St. P., M. & O. R. Co., supra, and cited approvingly, Flaccus v. Smith, post. The decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals in this case was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States. 207 U. S. 205, supra.

The case of Flaccus v. Smith, et. al. (1901), 199 Pa. 128, is analogous to the case at bar.

Flaccus was the proprietor of glass works at Tarentum, Pennsylvania. He ran his works non-union, and his employes consisted of men and apprentices, all of whom had agreed with their employer not to connect themselves with the Union, which in that case was otherwise known as the American Flint Glass Workers Union, affiliated with the American Federation of Labor.

The defendants in the case, W. J. Smith and others, were members of the American Flint Glass Workers' Union, and they tried to unionize the plaintiff's glass works at Tarentum by persuading the plaintiff's employes to join their Union. Flaccus, the plaintiff, brought his suit in the Court of Common Pleas, No. 2, for Allegheny County, to enjoin the defendants from interfering with his apprentices, and upon the Court, upon final hearing, enjoining the defendants from doing the acts complained of and from persuading the apprentices to join the Union, the defendants appealed.

In the report of the case, as decided by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, Judge Brown delivering the opinion of the Court said (54 L. R. A. 642):

> "The Court below found that Skelley, one of the appellants, had gatherings of the apprentices of the appellee at his room in a hotel and persuaded them to join the Union referred to; that he knew the character of the appellee's works as an independent factory, in which members of the Union were not employed and that his apprentices were bound in their indentures not to join or become subject to the rules or regulations of any such organization as he represented; that he knew these facts at the time he swore in these apprentices as members of the Union; that the apprentices who joined the Union violated the covenant of their indenture and subjected themselves to the orders of the Union, which made obedience to it paramount to obedience to their employer; that the object of Skelley was to break down the appellee's factory as a non-union factory, either by preventing the operation of his works or compelling him to join the Union; that the apprentices who joined the Union, enticed and persuaded so to do by Skelley, violated an express covenant of their indenture, which was one of great importance to the appellee, and Skelley so knew at the time he so enticed them; that Skelley's conduct and actions were very injurious to the appellee and his business, and, if repeated and persisted in, would in all probability utterly ruin his business; that Skelley's codefendants, by their counsel, openly and boldly justified him in all he did, contending that, as an officer or agent of the Union, he had a perfect right to interfere with plaintiff's apprentices, persuade them to join the Union, and secretly swear them in as members; that, if the Union had that right, either Skelley or some other agent could go to Tarentum at any time and interfere with the appellee's apprentices and business until it would be destroyed."

In deciding this case Judge Brown said:

"This is not a controversy between the employer and his employes, but between him and certain individuals associated as a labor union, unfriendly to the employment of independent labor, and seeking to induce the apprentices of the employer to violate the terms of their indentures with him. No question is here raised by the employer as to what his employes may or may not do, and the complaint sets forth no misconduct by them for which relief is asked. The appellants, outsiders, having no connection with the business of the appellee, are charged with enticing and endeavoring to entice the young men employed by him to violate the covenants of their apprenticeships with him, and protection is prayed for against the threatened ruin of his business, as found by the Court below. Having reviewed all the evidence, we are not perspaded that any of the Court's findings of fact ought to be disturbed, and, with them before us, the only question to be determined is whether the injunction should go out."

And on the same page (54 L. R. A. 642) in affirming the action of the lower Court, Judge Brown for the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania said:

"The appellee had an unquestioned right, in the conduct of his business, to employ workmen who were independent of any labor union, and he had the further right to adopt a system of apprenticeship which excluded his apprentices from membership in such a union. He was responsible to no one for his reasons in adopting such a system, and no one had a right to interfere with it to his prejudice or injury. Such an interference with it was an interference with his business, and, if unlawful, cannot be permitted. The Court found that the interference was injurious to him, and, if allowed to continue, would utterly ruin his business. The damages resulting from such an injury are incapable of ascertainment at law, and justice demands that specific relief be furnished in a court of equity. The test of equity jurisdiction is the absence of a plain and adequate remedy at law to the injured party, depending upon the character of the case as disclosed in the pleadings. If equity alone can furnish relief, the injunction must be issued."

Counsel for the defendants criticized in the lower court the case of Flaccus v. Smith, said it was not applicable because it was a case of enticement of apprentices, who, for all that appeared from the report, might have been bound out to service for a period of years, the term of apprenticeship not having expired; and further criticized the case on the ground that, by the enticement, Flaccus, the plaintiff, was deprived of the further services of his apprentices, and that, in this case, which is now at the bar of this Court, the plaintiff would, by the terms of its contracts with its employes, be, of its own volition, terminating those contracts upon plaintiff's employes joining the Union.

The entire record of the case of Flaccus v. Smith is in the prothonotary's office at Pittsburg, 790, Oct. Term, 1899, Court Common Pleas No. 2, Allegheny County, Pa. That record shows that the period of apprenticeship in each case was four years. Some had expired; some had not. Some of the apprentices were still under age; some were over the age of twenty-one years, but still working as apprentices. The bill was framed solely upon the ground that the defendants interfered with the contract relation created by the indentures of apprenticeship, each of which contained a clause which forbade the apprentice during his apprenticeship from joining any labor union or other organization which would interfere with the proper performance of his duties as apprentice while he remained an apprentice. The apprenticeship indentures did not mention the American Flint Glass Workers Union by name, and the question whether or not a breach of the indenture of apprenticeship was brought about by the apprentice joining the American Flint Glass Workers Union was a question of fact which the Court decided in favor of Flaccus.

When the apprentices joined the Union they were given their choice by Flaccus, either to renounce the Union or to quit work. Some renounced the Union, and others quit work and adhered to the Union. And it was claimed by the defendants that the plaintiff, Flaccus, discharged the apprentices, and, therefore had no cause of complaint against the defendants who had simply persuaded the apprentices to join the Union. The plaintiff's counsel in that case replied to that argument by saying, if Flaccus permitted the apprentices who had joined the Union to continue at work, his factory would soon be unionized, and that was just what the defendants were trying to accomplish and just what Flaccus was trying to prevent.

So, in the case now at the bar of this Court, plaintiff's employes have each made an express contract not to join the United Mine Workers of America, and there is no question of fact in this case, as there was in the Flaccus case, as to whether joining that Union would be detrimental to the interests of the employer, and, therefore, violative of the contract. The language of plaintiff's contracts with its employes is specific. Each employe has agreed not to join the United Mine Workers of America.

Plaintiff's case is a stronger case than the Flaccus case. And to establish that, in addition to the reference above made to the difference in the contracts in the two cases, a stronger case is presented for plaintiff by consideration of the fact that in the Flaccus case the persons enticed were merely apprentices, while in plaintiff's case the persons enticed are employes.

Dean Bigelow says:

> "It was formerly matter of some doubt whether an action could be maintained for interrupting, with notice, the gratuitous relation of master and servant.

> It was sometimes supposed that inasmuch as the master could not require the service, he had no right to it which could be infringed. But this view does not now obtain. Though a person may not be able to require a gratuity he has a right to it when it is given and as it is being received, and no one may lawfully interrupt his actual enjoyment of it. Hence, if a person be actually engaged in giving his services to another without reward, any one who with notice interrupts the service becomes liable for any damage sustained." Bigelow on Torts, Eighth ed. 259, 260.

Apprentices are but one remove from gratuitous servants. The Standard Dictionary's definition of "apprentice" as a noun is "A person, usually a minor, who serves another in order to learn a trade, art or profession, especially when bound by indentures for a term of years." The Century Dictionary defines the same word as meaning "One who is bound by indenture to serve some particular individual or company for a specified time, in order to learn some art, trade, profession, manufacture, etc., in which his master or masters become bound to instruct him." The definition of the same word given by Webster's Dictionary is "One who is bound by indentures or by legal agreement to serve a mechanic, or other person, for a certain time, with a view to learn the art, or trade, in which his master is bound to instruct him."

The Standard Dictionary's definition of "employe" is "A person who is employed; one who works for wages or a salary; one who is engaged in the service of or is employed by another." The Century Dictionary defines the same word as meaning "One who works for an employer; a person working for salary or wages: applied to any one so working, but usually only to clerks, workmen, laborers, etc., and but rarely to the higher officers of a corporation, or government, or to domestic servants; as the employes of a railroad company." Webster's Dictionary defines the same word as meaning "One employed by another; a clerk or workman in the service of an employer."

"Employer" is defined by the Standard Dictionary as "One who employes; one who uses or engages the services of other persons for pay." "Employer" is defined by the Century Dictionary as "One who employs; a user; a person engaging or keeping others in service." And Webster's Dictionary defines the same word as "One who employs another; as, an employer of workmen."

The difference between an employe and an apprentice is, therefore, very marked. In apprenticeships, the master has a beginner to instruct, and receives during the period of apprenticeship or period of instruction and as his compensatory offset the benefit of the labor of the person so instructed. The value of an apprentice's labor does not equal that of an employe who has risen above the period of learning a trade and has become expert and is employed as an expert. Likewise, to the apprentice himself, the value of the instruction is not of the importance that to the employe are that employe's wages. There is a certain element of gratuity in the relationship of master and apprentice on the part of both master and apprentice. Hence, the case now at the bar of this Court between plaintiff and its employes is a stronger case than the Flaccus case, wherein only apprentices had been persuaded to break their contract. But as Dean Bigelow says:

> "Though a person may not be able to require a gratuity he has a right to it when it is given and as it is being received, and no one may lawfully interrupt his actual enjoyment of it."

Therefore a more meritorious case than that in the case of a gratuity solely, is presented in the case of an interruption in the relationship existing between master and apprentice. A fortiori in the case of interference between employer and employe. All three of those cases, however, come within the reason of the same rule, that is, interrupting the relation of master and servant, such interruption going to the termination of the relationship or going to the breach of some of the conditions attaching to that relationship.

In the Flaccus case, the finding of the Court was that the defendants had enticed some of Flaccus' apprentices to join their Union, while the apprenticeship still existed, and that, therefore, these apprentices had in joining the Union recognized a new master in the Union, which had no financial interest in and had no connection with Flaccus' business, and to all of which Flaccus objected. It appeared that some oath was administered to each apprentice when he joined the Union, but the language of the oath is not shown.

In this case, now at the bar of this Court, plaintiff's employes are expert in their business, their services are rendered to the satisfaction of the plaintiff, and the pay given them by plaintiff is satisfactory to them. They have each expressly contracted with plaintiff not to join the United Mine Workers of America, and if the efforts of these defendants were to be allowed and the men induced to join the Union, the contracts which plaintiff's employes have with plaintiff would be broken, and thereby these employes would each have taken on a new master in the Union, that Union having no financial interest in and no concern with plaintiff's business. Upon joining that Union each of plaintiff's employes would be taking this obligation: "I do sincerely promise * * * to bear true allegiance to * * * the United Mine Workers of America." Allegiance is defined to be the tie or obligation of a subject to his sovereign. Century Dictionary. And in recognition of that new master's authority, each of plaintiff's employes would, by the further provision of the obligation of membership say, "I promise to cease work at any time I am called upon by the organization to do so."

The raison d' etre of the law applied in the Flaccus case is that every person must mind his own business, and must not intermeddle in the affairs of others.

In support of the same proposition see—

Thacker Coal & Coke Company v. Burke et als., supra.

It is not necessary that the contract of employment fix a definite term of service.

On this point, we ask the Court's attention to the following cases:

Thacker Coal & Coke Company v. Burke et als., supra, in which the Court said:

> "If the law gives action for enticement of a servant, it is not conceivable that a third person can maliciously entice away a lot of employes simply because there was no contract fixing term of service. The relation of master and servant exists. In such case there is a contract recognized by law, an implied contract by which the employe can recover for his service. By entering such service the employe agrees, contracts, to work. It is no difference that he can quit when he pleases."

Walker v. Cronin (1871). 107 Mass. 555.

The plaintiffs were engaged in the manufacture of boots and shoes in the town of Milford, Mass. They had men working for them, and while so employed the defendant and his associates knowing this, and that plaintiffs could not run their business without men, but for purposes of their own, induced and persuaded plaintiffs' men to abandon and leave plaintiffs' employment without plaintiffs' consent and against plaintiffs' will, whereby plaintiffs suffered damage. Plaintiffs sued for the tort. The declaration on demurrer was dismissed in the Court of first resort. On appeal the Supreme Court of Massachusetts held that the plaintiffs had a right of action, and that the declaration set that forth sufficiently, when it was alleged, and by the demurrer admitted to be true that the defendant and his associates had induced and persuaded plaintiffs' employes to leave and abandon plaintiffs' employment, and that (1) the acts were intentional and wilful, (2) calculated to cause damage to plaintiffs in their lawful business, (3) done with the unlawful purpose to cause such damage and loss without right or justifiable cause on the part of the defendant (which constitutes malice), and (4) actual damage and loss resulting.

The point was made in Walker v. Cronin that the men were not under contract for any specific length of time. The Court overruled that point.

Frank et al. v. Herold et al., (1902). 63 N. J. Eq. 443. 52 Atl. 152.

The plaintiffs operated silk mills in Patterson, New Jersey. There were upward of eighty defendants, who were charged with conspiring together and acting separately to prevent plaintiffs' operatives from continuing to work for them and to prevent other persons from entering the employment of the plaintiffs. A restraining order had been granted which prevented the defendants from the use of persuasion and peaceable means to get plaintiffs' employes to quit working for plaintiffs, and to prevent persons who had agreed to work for plaintiffs from doing so. A motion was made to modify the restraining order, and reliance was had upon a statute of New Jersey, reading as follows:

> "It shall not be unlawful for any two or more persons to unite, combine or bind themselves by oath, covenant, agreement, alliance or otherwise, to persuade, advise or encourage, by peaceable means, any person or persons to enter into any combination for or against leaving or entering into the employment of any person, persons or corporation."

In refusing to modify the restraining order, the Court said with reference to the statute:

> "In my judgment, the true construction of the act of 1883 is simply that it renders innocent, as against the public, an act, which, previous to its passage, was a misdemeanor, and punishable by indictment. It does not take away, or in any wise affect, any private rights which may arise out of acts which are legalized by that legislation. It is palpable that the legislature was dealing with a criminal act, and the language of the statute must be construed accordingly. It cannot be construed as rendering an act lawful as against an individual which otherwise would be unlawful."

The Court in deciding that case held:

> "To make out the relation of master and servant, it is not necessary that there be any written, or even verbal, contract between the parties to work for any particular length of time, but the relation exists where one person is willing to work for another from day to day, and that other desires the labor and makes his business arrangements accordingly."

Chipley v. Atkinson, (1887). 23 Fla. 206. 11 Am. St. Rep. 367. 1 So. 934.

Atkinson, the plaintiff, was in the employment of Kehoe & Walker, who were partners in the manufacture and sale of brick. Atkinson had been employed as general superintendent of their business. Chipley caused the discharge of the plaintiff, and was then sued by Atkinson.

Chipley defended on the ground that Atkinson did not have a contract with Kehoe & Walker for a definite length of time. The Court held:

> "An action will also lie where the period for which the employment is to continue is not certain, if damage result from the discharge."

And after citing cases, the Court said:

> "From the authorities referred to in the preceding paragraphs, and upon principle, it is apparent that neither the fact that the term of service interrupted is not for a fixed period, nor the fact that there is not a right of action against the person who is induced or influenced to terminate the service, or to refuse to perform his agreement, is of itself a bar to an action against the third person maliciously and wantonly procuring the termination of or a refusal to perform the agreement. It is the legal right of the party to such agreement to terminate it or refuse to perform it, and in doing so he violates no right of the other party to it, but, so long as the former is willing and ready to perform, it is not the legal right, but is a wrong, on the part of a third party to maliciously and wantonly procure the former to terminate or refuse to perform it."

Plaintiff's rights are not affected by the fact that the conspiracy was not consummated and that plaintiff's employes did not join the Union and did not quit working for plaintiff.

For this we rely upon the case of State v. Buchanan (1821). 5 Har. & J., (Md.), 317, 352, 355.

"There is nothing in the objection that to punish a conspiracy where the end is not accomplished would be to punish a mere unexecuted intention. It is not the bare intention that the law punishes, but the act of conspiring, which is made a substantive offense by the nature of the object intended to be effected." In the same case, it is held: "An indictment will lie at common law for a conspiracy to do an act neither illegal nor immoral in an individual, but to effect a purpose, which has a tendency to prejudice the public."

Likewise, an indictment will lie at common law "For a malicious conspiracy to impoverish or ruin a third person in his trade, or profession."

On the proposition that the defendants in trying to unionize plaintiff's mine without plaintiff's consent and against plaintiff's will, even if done only by the use of argument, reason and persuasion, violate plaintiff's rights under the Constitution of West Virginia, we rely upon—

Bill of Rights, §1. Art. III, Constitution of West Virginia.

"All men are, by nature, equally free and independent, and have certain inherent rights, of which, when they enter into a state of society, they cannot, by any compact, deprive or divest their posterity, namely: the enjoyment of life and liberty, with the means of acquiring and possessing property, and of pursuing and obtaining happiness and safety."

Bill of Rights, §10, Art. III, Constitution of West Virginia.

"No person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or the judgment of his peers."

State v. Goodwill (1889), 33 W. Va. 179, 10 S. E. 285, 287, 6 L. R. A. 621, 25 Am. St. Rep. 863.

"A person living under the protection of this government has the right to adopt and follow any lawful industrial pursuit, not injurious to the community, which he may see fit. And, as incident to this, is the right to labor or employ labor; make contracts in respect thereto, upon such terms as may be agreed upon by the parties; to enforce all lawful contracts; to sue, and give evidence; and to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, and convey property of every kind. The enjoyment or deprivation of these rights and privileges constitutes the essential distinction between freedom and slavery; between liberty and oppression."

And again—"The vocation of an employer, as well as that of his employe, is his property. Depriving the owner of property of one of its attributes is depriving him of his property, under the provisions of the Constitution. People v. Otis, 90 N. Y. 48. The right to use, buy, and sell property, and contract in respect thereto, including contracts for labor—which is, as we have seen, property—is protected by the Constitution. If the legislature without any public necessity, has the power to prohibit or restrict the right of contract between private persons in respect to one lawful trade or business, then it may prevent the prosecution of all trades, and regulate all contracts."

A similar view of a similar constitutional provision is found in Young's Case v. Virginia (1903), 101 Va. 853, 45 S. E. 327.

In that case it is held:

> "The word 'liberty,' as used in the Constitution of the United States, and of the several States, is deemed to embrace the right of a citizen to be free in the employment of all his faculties; to be free to use them in all lawful ways; to live and work where he will; to earn his livelihood by any lawful calling, and for that purpose to enter into all contracts which may be proper, necessary, and essential to his carrying out to a successful conclusion the purpose above mentioned."

In the case of State v. Stewart (1887), 59 Vt. 273, 59 Am. Rep. 710, 9 Atl. 559, the Court on page 289 (59 Vermont) says:

> "The principle upon which the cases, English and American, proceed, is, that every man has the right to employ his talents, industry and capital as he pleases, free from the dictation of others; and if two or more persons combine to coerce his choice in this behalf, it is a criminal conspiracy. The labor and skill of the workman, be it of high or low degree, the plant of the manufacturer, the equipment of the farmer, the investments of commerce, are all in equal sense property. If men, by overt acts of violence destroy either they are guilty of crime. The anathemas of a secret organization of men combined for the purpose of controlling the industry of others by a species of intimidation that works upon the mind rather than the body, are quite as dangerous, and generally altogether more effective, than acts of actual violence. And while such conspiracies may give to the individual directly affected by them a private right of action for damages, they at the same time lay a basis for an indictment on the ground that the State itself is directly concerned in the promotion of all legitimate industries, and the development of all its resources, and owes the duty of protection to its citi> zens engaged in the exercise of their callings. The good order, peace and general prosperity of the State are directly involved in the question."

Upon parallel provisions of the Constitution of the United States, Mr. Justice Field, concurring with the opinion of the Court, which was delivered by Mr. Justice Miller, in Butchers' Union, etc., Co. v. Crescent City, etc., Co., (1884), 111 U. S. 746; 28 L. ed. 585, 591; 4 S. C. 652, said:

> "As in our intercourse with our fellow-men certain principles of morality are assumed to exist, without which society would be impossible, so certain inherent rights lie at the foundation of all governmental action, and upon a recognition of them alone can free institutions be maintained. These inherent rights have never been more happily expressed than in the Declaration of Independence, that new evangel of liberty to the people: 'We hold these truths to be self-evident,' that is so plain that their truth is recognized upon their mere statement, 'that all men are endowed;' not by edicts of Emperors or decrees of Parliament or Acts of Congress, but 'by their Creator, with certain inalienable rights' that is, rights which cannot be bartered away or given away or taken away except in punishment of crime; 'and that among these are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness, and to secure these,' not grant them but secure them, 'governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed.'
> "Among these inalienable rights, as proclaimed in that great document, is the right of men to pursue their happiness, by which is meant the right to pursue any lawful business or vocation, in any manner not inconsistent with the equal rights of others, which may increase their prosperity or develop their faculties, so as to give to them their highest enjoyment.

> "The common business and callings of life, the ordinary trades and pursuits, which are innocuous in themselves and have been followed in all communities from time immemorial, must, therefore, be free in this country to all alike upon the same conditions. The right to pursue them, without let or hindrance, except that which is applied to all persons of the same age, sex and condition, is a distinguishing privilege of citizens of the United States, and an essential element of that freedom which they claim as their birthright."

In the same case, Mr. Justice Bradley, concurring, with whom concurred Mr. Justice Harlan and Mr. Justice Woods, (111 U. S. 762; 28 L. ed. 589) said:

> "The right to follow any of the common occupations of life is an inalienable right; it was formulated as such under the phrase 'pursuit of happiness' in the Declaration of Independence, which commenced with the fundamental proposition that 'All men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness.' This right is a large ingredient in the civil liberty of the citizen. To deny it to all but a few favored individuals, by investing the latter with a monopoly, is to invade one of the fundamental privileges of the citizen, contrary not only to common right, but, as I think, to the express words of the Constitution. It is what no Legislature has a right to do."

In Allgeyer et al. v. State of Louisiana, (1897), 165U.S. 578, 589; 41 L. ed. 832, 835; 17 S. C. 427, Mr. Justice Peckham delivering the opinion of the Court said of the meaning of the word "liberty"—

> "The term is deemed to embrace the right of the citizen to be free in the enjoyment of all his faculties; > to be free to use them in all lawful ways; to live and work where he will; to earn his livelihood by any lawful calling; to pursue any livelihood or avocation, and for that purpose to enter into all contracts which may be proper, necessary, and essential to his carrying out to a successful conclusion the purposes above mentioned."

In Lochner v. People of the State of New York (1905), 198 U. S. 45, 56; 49 L. ed. 937, 940, 941; 25 S. C. 539, Mr. Justice Peckham delivering the opinion of the Court said:

> "The general right to make a contract in relation to his business is part of the liberty of the individual protected by the 14th Amendment of the Federal Constitution."

And again said:

> "Of course the liberty of contract relating to labor includes both parties to it. The one has as much right to purchase as the other to sell labor."

Plaintiff has a right to contract against members of the United Mine Workers. Laws prohibiting discrimination against Labor Unions have uniformly been held to be unconstitutional in the United States.

In support of this, we rely upon—

> Goldfield Consolidated Mines Company v. Goldfield Miners' Union, No. 220. (C. C. D. Nev. 1908.) 159 Fed. 500.

On page 515, Judge Farrington says:

> "The right of master and servant to enter into contracts, to agree upon the terms and conditions under which the one will employ and the other will > labor, is property. The master has the right to fix the terms and conditions upon which he is willing to give employment; the servant has the right to fix the terms and conditions upon which he will labor, and any statute which curtails and limits that right deprives the party affected of his property, and, in the same measure, of his liberty. Both parties are free to enter into, or refuse to enter into, the contract. Before the law, there is the same freedom to employ as to work, to buy as to sell, to choose one's employe as to choose one's employer."

In that case the plaintiff required its employes to agree not to become members of the Goldfield Miners' Union, and the defendants relied upon the Statute of Nevada, making it unlawful for any person, firm or corporation to make or enter into any agreement, either oral or in writing, by the terms of which any employe of such person, firm or corporation, or any person about to enter the employ of such person, firm or corporation, as a condition for continuing or obtaining such employment, shall promise or agree not to become or continue a member of a labor organization, or shall promise or agree to become or continue a member of a labor organization.

In holding this Statute unconstitutional, the Court said:

> "Statutes similar to the Nevada act in question have existed in other States, but in every jurisdiction where their validity has been called in question, they have been held invalid, under the constitutional provision that no one shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law."

See the cases quoted by the Court on page 516.

> Adair v. United States (1908). 208 U. S. 161, 52 L. ed. 436. 28 Sup. Ct. 277.

In Adair v. United States, the Supreme Court held unconstitutional the Federal Statute which made it a criminal offense for any common carrier engaged in interstate business to discriminate against any employe because of his membership in a labor organization.

> "Nor shall any person or persons, or combination of persons, by force, threats, menaces, or intimidation of any kind, prevent or attempt to prevent from working in or about any mine, any person or persons who have the lawful right to work in or about the same, and who desire so to work; but this provision shall not be so construed as to prevent any two or more persons from associating together under the name of Knights of Labor, or any other name they may desire, for any lawful purpose, or for using moral suasion or lawful argument to induce any one not to work in and about any mine; any person or persons who shall violate the provisions of this section shall, upon conviction, be fined not less than fifty nor more than five hundred dollars, or be imprisoned in the county jail not less than ten days nor more than ninety days, in the discretion of the court."

This section has been invoked by the defendants in support of the rights they claim in this court. But in the case of Thacker Coal & Coke Company v. Burke et als., supra, it was held that this section is a criminal act, and that it does not authorize any individual or number of individuals to maliciously entice servants to desert the service in which they are engaged, nor prevent them from engaging in such services under contract; nor does it restrict the master's right to sue another for damages resulting from the malicious enticement of the servant.

The Court very pertinently suggests—"Could the Legislature authorize any person to violate a contract."

It will be noticed that the holding of the Supreme Court of West Virginia in this case is along the lines of that of the Supreme Court of New Jersey upon a similar statute. Frank v. Herold, supra.

State v. Goodwill, supra. 10 S. E. 286.

> "The rights of every individual must stand or fall by the same rule of law that governs every other member of the body politic under similar circumstances; and every partial or private law which directly proposes to destroy or affect individual rights, or does the same thing by restricting the privileges of certain classes of citizens and not of others, when there is no public necessity for such discrimination, is unconstitutional and void."

Upon parallel provisions of the Constitution of the United States, the Supreme Court in holding unconstitutional, in the case of Lochner v. New York, supra, a statute of that State, which limited the hours of work in bakeries to sixty hours a week and ten hours a day, (198 U. S. 64; 49 L. ed. 944, 945) said:

> "It is manifest to us that the limitation of the hours of labor as provided for in this section of the statute under which the indictment was found and the plaintiff in error convicted, has no such direct relation to, and no such substantial effect upon the health of the employe, as to justify us in regarding the section as really a health law. It seems to us that the real object and purpose were simply to regulate the hours of labor between the master and his employes, (all being men, sui juris), in a private business, not dangerous in any degree to morals, or in any real and substantial degree to the health of the employes. Under such circumstances the freedom of master and employe to contract with each other in relation to their employment, and in defining the same, cannot be prohibited or interfered with, without violating the Federal Constitution."

And as to what is a monopoly at common law.

See Pocahontas Coke Company v. Powhatan Coal and Coke Company, (1906). 60 W. Va. 508. 56 S. E. 264, 269, 270, 271. 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 268. 9 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 667, 672, 673, 674.

"Monopolies are condemned at common law, as being in restraint of trade and against public policy. The Case of Monopolies, 11 Coke 84; Mitchel v. Reynolds, 1 P. Wms. 181."

And it is held that where all the sources of supply are put in the hands of one company so that no other source of supply is available, such a monopoly is absolute. It is that sort of a monopoly that the United Mine Workers of America aim to be—

"One of the objects of this organization is to unite all employes in and around the coal mines of Ohio and the Panhandle district of West Virginia."

"All men are eligible and must be members of the United Mine Workers of America who work in and around the mines."

And speaking of the contract which was involved in the case under consideration in Pocahontas Coke Company v. Powhatan Coal and Coke Company, the Court said:

"A contract which is charged to be in restraint of trade is not to be tested by what has been done under it, but by what may be done under it; not by its performance, but by its power of performance when fully exercised."

The United Mine Workers are therefore to be judged not only by what they have done, but by what they will do if they get the chance. They have the power. Their Constitutions, and their declared purposes as shown by their proceedings in their conventions referred to in the bill, illumine the design of their organization, and confirm the conclusion that they are a monopoly at common law, and as such are engaged in an unlawful business.

On the proposition that it is unlawful to attempt to force all laborers to combine in unions, and that such an attempt is against the policy of the common law because aiming at monopoly.

> See Berry v. Donovan, (1905). 188 Mass. 353. 74 N. E. 603. 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 899. 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 738.
> "The attempt to force all laborers to combine in unions is against the policy of the law because aiming at monopoly."

That a Labor Union is not a competitor of the employer.

> See Geo. Jonas Glass Company v. Glass Bottle Blowers' Association of the United States and Canada et al. (1907). N. J. Eq. 66 Atl. 953.
>
> "A labor organization seeking to compel a manufacturer to unionize his plant is not such a competitor in the labor market as to justify it in enticing employes to leave the service of their master, or to induce persons seeking employment with him from so doing, when the enticer does not employ labor. The competition which the law upholds must be honest competition, and not a malicious attempt to injure another."

The union itself recognizes that its members are competitors one with another. The obligation of membership recognizes that fact in these words: "As the mine workers of the entire country are competitors in the labor world, I promise to cease work at any time I am called upon by the organization to do so."

It does not appear that the union anywhere recognizes the employer of labor as a competitor of the union, but for the purpose of argument let it be assumed that an employer is a competitor of the union to the extent that the union seeks to have all mine workers become members of its union and that a non-union employer seeks to have men work for it and not become members of the union. In that view of the case, what is the law in view of plaintiff's contractual relations with its employes?

In Beekman v. Marsters, supra, Judge Loring, in delivering the opinion of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, says:

> "No case has been cited which holds that a right to compete justifies a defendant in intentionally inducing a third person to take away from the plaintiff his contractual rights. Not only has no case been cited in which that has been held, but no case has been cited in which that contention has been put forward."

That the purpose of strengthening itself in future contests with employers of labor is no justification to the defendants for interfering in the contractual relations existing between plaintiff and plaintiff's employees.

See Berry v. Donovan, supra.

> "The purpose of strengthening itself in future contests with the employer will not justify a labor union in interfering with the contracts of non-union workmen for the purpose of compelling them to join the union," and

"The gain which a labor union may expect to derive from inducing others to join it is not an improvement to be obtained directly in the conditions under which the men are working, but only added strength for such contests with employers as may arise in the future. An object of this kind is too remote to be considered a benefit in business, such as to justify the infliction of intentional injury upon a third person for the purpose of obtaining it. If such an object were treated as legitimate, and allowed to be pursued to its complete accomplishment, every employe would be forced into membership in a union, and the unions, by a combination of those in different trades and occupations, would have complete and absolute control of all the industries of the country. Employers would be forced to yield to all their demands or give up business. The attainment of such an object in the struggle with employers would not be competition, but monopoly. A monopoly controlling anything which the world must have is fatal to prosperity and progress. In matters of this kind the law does not tolerate monopolies."

West Virginia Transportation Company v. Standard Oil Company, supra.

"Where the act is not done under the right of competition, or under cover of friendly, neighborly counsel, but wantonly or maliciously, with intent to injure another, it is actionable, if loss ensue. Nor is it material in the latter case that there was no binding contract between the business man and his customers. He cannot interfere even for his own benefit, if there is a contract."

Thacker Coal & Coke Company v. Burke et als., supra.

"We do not deny the principle that a man may do an act damaging another, even maliciously, when he has legal excuse or justification therefor; but we > say that when his action, with knowledge on his part of a contract, causes, by intention, a breach of that contract, he is liable to damages, even though he acts for the promotion of his own interest."

On the proposition that the defendants may not lawfully at common law combine and conspire to unionize plaintiff's mine without plaintiff's consent and against plaintiff's will, even though their acts are limited to the use of argument, reason and persuasion, where the unionizing has for its object the advancement of the union's power, or where the unionizing is brought about by interfering with the contractual relations existing between plaintiff and plaintiff's employees.

> See Purvis et al. v. Local No. 500, United Brotherhood of Carpenters & Joiners et al. (1906). 214 Pa. 348. 63 Atl. 585. 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 642. 6 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 275.

In this case it was said:

> "The right of a workman to freely use his hands, and to use them for just whom he pleases, upon just such terms as he pleases, is his property; and so in no less degree is a man's business in which he has invested his capital. The right of each—employer and employe—is an absolute one, inherent and indefeasible, of which neither can be deprived, not even by the legislature itself. The protection of it, though as old as the common law, has been reguaranteed in our Bill of Rights. 'All men are born equally free and independent, and have certain inherent and indefeasible rights, among which are those of enjoying and defending life and liberty, of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property and reputation, and of pursuing their own happiness.' "

This language quoted from Pennsylvania's Bill of Rights is analogous to the provisions of the Bill of Rights in West Virginia.

Arthur v. Oakes.
(Circuit Court of Appeals, Seventh Circuit, October 1, 1894). 11 C. C. A. 209. 63 Fed. 310.

In Arthur v. Oakes, it was held:

"A combination or conspiracy to procure an employe or body of employes to quit service in violation of the contract of service would be unlawful, and in a proper case might be enjoined, if the injury threatened would be irremediable at law."

And again, "An intent upon the part of a single person to injure the rights of others or of the public is not in itself a wrong of which the law will take cognizance, unless some injurious act be done in execution of the unlawful intent. But a combination of two or more persons with such an intent, and under circumstances that give them, when so combined, a power to do an injury they would not possess as individuals acting singly, has always been recognized as in itself wrongful and illegal."

Hopkins et al. v. Oxley Stave Company.
(Circuit Court of Appeals, Eighth Circuit, November 8, 1897). 28 C. C. A. 99. 83 Fed. 912.

In Hopkins et al. v. Oxley Stave Company, it was held:

"First, that the combination in question was an unlawful conspiracy to deprive the plaintiff of its right to manage its business as it thought best, such as would entitle the manufacturer to recover from the parties concerned in the conspiracy whatever damages it had sustained thereby; second, that in such a case the test of the right to sue in equity was whether the damages occasioned by the conspiracy would be irreparable, or whether a proceeding in equity was necessary to prevent a multitude of suits. in other words, whether the remedy at law was for any reason inadequate; third, that in the case in hand the plaintiff was entitled to sue in equity, and that an injunction to prevent the execution of the conspiracy was properly awarded."

That injunctive relief is proper in plaintiff's case.

See Arthur v. Oakes, supra.

Hopkins et al. v. Oxley Stave Company, supra.

That the injunction should cover, not only the acts complained of in plaintiff's bill, but should be broad enough to restrain the commission of acts identical in character with those which are set out as the primary cause of complaint in plaintiff's bill, and that this injunction should, as it is now framed to do, prevent defendants for all time from doing acts by persuasion or otherwise, which have for their purpose the unionizing of plaintiff's mine without plaintiff's consent and against plaintiff's will.

See Bitterman et al. v. Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, supra.

It is the policy of the law to prevent recurrence of wrongs which have been adjudged to be illegal. Not to do so would be to invite a multiplicity of suits.

(3) Salient Points which Differentiate the Rights which the Defendants Claim from the Rights which they really lawfully have.

We will sub-divide this by considering—

(3) a. Certain facts in this case, which show the motive of defendants, and, therefore, should be considered by this Court.

(3) b. Plaintiff's rights and defendants' rights under those facts.

(3) c. Are the acts of the defendants heretofore committed, which have injured plaintiff, and are the acts, which they design to do, and which will likewise injure plaintiff, justified?

(3) a. Certain Facts in this Case, which Show the Motive of Defendants, and, Therefore, Should Be Considered by this Court.

We have called attention to the fact that when first opened up plaintiff's mine was operated non-union; that under pressure from these defendants plaintiff permitted its mine to be unionized in the spring of 1903; that the mine was operated union from the spring of 1903 to June 12, 1906; that during the time the mine was operated non-union in the years 1902 and 1903 plaintiff had no labor trouble; that during the time it was operated union from March, 1903, to June 12, 1906, plaintiff lost one hundred and sixty days on account of labor troubles, and we supplement that by adding that plaintiff has had no strike or labor trouble since starting to run non-union June 12, 1906; the only interruption was the interference with plaintiff's business, brought about by these defendants, which would have resulted in a shut down of plaintiff's mine had it not been for the temporary restraining order of October 24, 1907, granted ex parte and later on for the temporary injunction granted on hearing May 26, 1908, and now for the permanent injunction awarded January 18, 1913.

So far as any contractual or other business relationship between the plaintiff and the Union is concerned, the parting of the ways was reached when the national strike was declared April 1, 1906. Plaintiff had no dispute with its employes at that time, nor had it any with the defendants. The national strike of April 1, 1906, was ordered for the purpose of compelling mine operators to sign a new scale. Plaintiff was willing to sign that scale and continue its operations, and owing to its business necessities at that time to complete contracts then on hand for the delivery of coal, plaintiff proposed to its employes, and likewise proposed to these defendants, then, as now, officers of the United Mine Workers of America, that plaintiff would pay whatever wages the new scale when signed might provide for. And plaintiff proposed to pay ad interim to its employes, who were then members of the United Mine Workers of America, the scale of wages then in force, and to continue to pay that until the new scale might be agreed upon between the Union and operators in other parts of the country, who, with the United Mine Workers of America, as an organization, had under consideration the preparation of, and an agreement upon, a new scale. Plaintiff at the same time offered to date the wages of its employes back to April 1, 1906, and to pay to its men any excess, provided the new scale happened to be higher than the old scale. If the new scale when signed proved to be lower than the expiring scale, the men employed would have been ahead by that arrangement. The employes, therefore, had everything to gain, and nothing to lose, by continuing in plaintiff's service.

Plaintiff's employes were willing to make this arrangement, and did make that arrangement, and in carrying it out, worked until April 16, 1906, when acting under the orders of these defendants, who were then their superior officers in the Union, plaintiff's employes went out on the national strike, which had been ordered April 1, 1906, but which up to April 16, 1906, plaintiff's employes had not obeyed.

The reason assigned by defendants, then, as now, officers of the United Mine Workers of America, for not permitting plaintiff's employes to continue at work for plaintiff, was that the new scale had not been signed by certain coal operators in other sections of the country, and that to compel them to sign, it was necessary that all coal operations be suspended. Plaintiff was not a member of any operators' association with which the United Mine Workers of America, as a body, were treating in the matter of the new scale, and under the action taken by these defendants, then, as now representing the United Mine Workers of America, plaintiff was compelled to suffer loss in order that these defendants might whip into line certain other coal operators with whom the United Mine Workers, represented then as now by these defendants, had a grievance.

The inception of the present controversy between the plaintiff and these defendants, therefore, springs from the unlawful act of these defendants in making the plaintiff an unwilling and an unnecessary victim of the effort of these defendants to compel others to do what plaintiff had offered and was willing to do.

At the time plaintiff's employes were driven to obedience by their officers, and while plaintiff's employes were still working for plaintiff, plaintiff notified these defendants, then, as now, acting as officers of the United Mine Workers of America, that, if they, these officers, brought out plaintiff's employes on strike, under the circumstances as they then existed, and in view of plaintiff's offer to pay the scale, plaintiff would deal with the United Mine Workers of America no more, and that the men would not be re-employed through the Union. It was expressly stated to these defendants that they would be taking from plaintiff's employes, who were then members of the Union, what they would never be able to give back to them, namely, re-employment with plaintiff through the Union.

But the defendants persisted and plaintiff's employes ceased work.

The infliction of wrong by one person upon another in order to coerce a third person into doing what that third person does not want to do is a grave offense.

Upon this question of the unnecessary infliction of wrong, the case of Waterhouse v. Comer (C. C., W. D. Georgia S. D. 1893), 55 Fed. 149, is in point. The Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers as an organization had certain rules. Rule No. 12 read: "That hereafter when an issue has been sustained by the grand chief and carried into effect by the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, it shall be recognized as a violation of the obligations if a member of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers who may be employed on a railroad run in connection with or adjacent to said road (to) handle the property belonging to said railroad or system in any way that may benefit said company with which the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers are at issue, until the grievances or issues of difference of any nature or kind have been amicably settled."

In construing this rule, it was admitted that the following represented the probable result in a given case (55 Fed. 155): "If, in the pursuance of the business of a common carrier, with which the receiver is charged, it should become necessary to convey over the lines of the Central Railroad a car belonging to a railroad company on which there was a strike of the engineers, that it would be the duty of the brotherhood men in the employ of the receiver to refuse to haul the train containing such car, and, if the officers of the road insisted that the car should proceed, loyalty to the brotherhood required that the engineer should at once resign his station, and abandon his duty. He might, * * * if he thought proper, carry the train to the terminal point."

In condemning this rule, Judge Speer said (55 Fed. 156):

> "There can be not a doubt that this rule of the brotherhood is in direct and positive violation of the laws of the land, and no court, state or federal, could hesitate for a moment so to declare it."

And before Judge Speer permitted the receiver in that case to continue dealing with the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, he required that, as to the receiver, and as to the road, then under the charge of the Court, Rule 12 should be abrogated.

This same Rule 12 was passed upon by Judge Taft in the case of Toledo, Ann Arbor & North Michigan Railway Company v. Pennsylvania Company et al. (C. C., N. D. Ohio, W. D. 1893), 54 Fed. 730. On page 738 (54 Fed.) Judge Taft says:

> "It may be noted, in passing, that the enforcement of rule 12 presents a much stronger case of illegality than the ordinary boycott."

After plaintiff's men quit work April 16, 1906, plaintiff's mine was idle until June 12, 1906. Its contracts remained unfu'filled, and it was put to great loss in providing coal with which to coal the engines of the B. & O. R. R., and to retain that trade.

On June 12, 1906, owing to their dissatisfaction about the payment of benefits, plaintiff's men went to work for plaintiff non-union, and they have worked for plaintiff non-union and plaintiff has run non-union ever since. These defendants then found to their chagrin that their ill-advised action in compelling plaintiff's employes to quit work and in compelling plaintiff's mine to remain idle had cost the Union, not only the membership of the men in plaintiff's employ, but through plaintiff's adherence to its previously announced determination, never to contract with or recognize the defendants again, had lost them their "check off," which in the two years preceding the strike of April 1, 1906, had brought into the Union's coffers nearly ten thousand dollars.

They then conceived the plan of inveigling plaintiff into their meshes again, by coming to plaintiff's management and proposing that plaintiff recognize the Union, and go through the empty form of suppositionally discharging its men, and instanter re-employing them again; such re-employment, however, to be made through the medium of a contract, to be signed between plaintiff on the one hand, and these defendants, then, as now, officers of and representing the United Mine Workers of America, on the other hand.

When this sort of an arrangement was refused by plaintiff's management, these defendants asked that it be put up to plaintiff's Board of Directors. This was done by the management, and plaintiff's Board of Directors refused to have anything whatever to do with these defendants and with the United Mine Workers of America. This conclusion and resolve were promptly made known to these defendants.

Following that the defendants tried to unionize plaintiff's men, in the manner, at the times and through professional organizers, all as set forth at large in the bill.

Their purpose was to reassert their sway over plaintiff's men and plaintiff's mine; and it is now their purpose, under the guise of reason, argument and persuasion, to reassert their control over plaintiff's men, make them all join the Union, each of them nolens volens and bring plaintiff again under their yoke, an unwilling and a protesting victim of their inordinate greed, of their unlawful practices and intolerant rule.

And the law says their motive is to be read into their efforts.

The case of Swift & Company v. United States, supra, was one which involved the Anti-Trust Law which was enacted by Congress to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies; but so far as the use we now want to make of that case is concerned, there is no difference between the principle announced in that case and the principle applicable to a proceeding against a monopoly at common law. It will be recalled that plaintiff's bill places the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court over plaintiff's case, solely upon diversity of citizenship. But the rule which forbids plaintiff in such a case from relying upon federal law as the basis of its right to relief does not forbid the use of federal authorities where the propositions decided under federal law are applicable to similar prosecutions if had at common law.

Syllabus 1 of the case of Swift & Company v. United States, supra, reads as follows:

> "A general allegation of intent may color and apply to all the specific charges of a bill which seeks relief against alleged violations of the act of July 2, 1890, (26 Stat. at L. 209, chap. 647 U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3200), to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies."

In plaintiff's case now at the bar of this Court, the bill has been framed so as to allege successive elements of a single connected scheme, and the collective effect of all of these facts is there set forth. It is further then alleged in the bill that the effort of these defendants and of the United Mine Workers of America, over which the present controversy between the plaintiff and the defendants exists, is "to compel all miners and mine workers to join the Union, establish a monopoly and force employers of that kind of labor, and especially to force your orator, to yield to the Union's demands, or else to give up its business."

In deciding the case of Swift & Company v. United States, above referred to, Mr. Justice Holmes said (196 U. S. 396):

> "Intent is almost essential to such a combination, and is essential to such an attempt. Where acts are not sufficient in themselves to produce a result which the law seeks to prevent,—for instance, the monopoly,—but require further acts in addition to the mere forces of nature to bring that result to pass, an intent to bring it to pass is necessary in order to produce a dangerous probability that it will happen."

The case of Aikens v. Wisconsin (1904), 195 U. S. 194, 49 L. ed. 154, 25 S. C. 3, is instructive and to the point.

In that case there were two other cases of similar character, and they were all heard together, being on writs of error to the Supreme Court of Wisconsin, brought to set aside convictions and sentences of the plaintiffs in error, the defendants below, upon informations filed by the district attorney, which informations had been brought under the Wisconsin statutes, which impose imprisonment or fine on "any two or more persons who shall combine * * * for the purpose of wilfully or maliciously injuring another in his reputation, trade, business, or profession, by any means whatever," etc.

Mr. Justice Holmes in delivering the opinion of the Court said:

> "The plaintiffs in error were severally charged with unlawfully combining together with the intent of wilfully and maliciously injuring The Journal Company, a corporation, and certain persons named, stockholders and officers of the company, in their trade and business. It was alleged that the company was publisher of a newspaper in Milwaukee, and had notified an increase of about 25 per cent in its charges for advertising, and that thereupon the plaintiffs in error, who were managers of other newspapers in the same place, in pursuance of their combination, and with the intent of wilfully, maliciously, and unlawfully injuring The Journal Company and the others named, agreed as follows: If any person should agree to pay the increased rate to The Journal Company, then he should not be permitted to advertise in any of the other three newspapers except at a corresponding increase of rate; but if he should refuse to pay The Journal Company the increased rate, then he should be allowed to advertise in any of the other three papers at the rate previously charged. It was alleged that this conspiracy was carried out, and that much damage to the business of The Journal Company ensued."

The defendants admitted the combination, the intent to injure The Journal Company and the resulting damage, but alleged that the combination was entered into in trade competition, and that the parties had the right to make it under the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

In affirming the judgment of the Supreme Court of Wisconsin, in each of those three cases, the Supreme Court of the United States in an opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Holmes said (195 U. S. 205, 206):

> "It would be impossible to hold that the liberty to combine to inflict such mischief, even upon such intangibles as business or reputation, was among the rights which the 14th Amendment was intended to preserve." And again: "Where the acts consist of making a combination calculated to cause temporal damage, the power to punish such acts, when done maliciously, cannot be denied because they are to be followed and worked out by conduct which might have been lawful if not preceded by the acts. No conduct has such an absolute privilege as to justify all possible schemes of which it may be a part. The most innocent and constitutionally protected of acts or omissions may be made a step in a criminal plot, and if it is a step in a plot, neither its innocence nor the Constitution is sufficient to prevent the punishment of the plot by law."

The case of the United States ex rel. Guaranty Trust Company of New York v. Haggerty et al., 116 Fed. 510, is pertinent. In that case, the United Mine Workers were endeavoring to organize non-union mines of the Clarksburg Fuel Company, and having been restrained in that work, the defendants pleaded that freedom of speech was being denied to them. That same idea is advanced by counsel for the defendants in the case at bar. Judge Jackson disposed of that point when raised in the Haggerty case in language which, we think, will appeal to the Court in this case. Judge Jackson said (116 Fed. 517):

> "It is idle for this class of people to attempt to shield themselves, from not only a just criticism of their principles, but from their violations of law and order, by citing and relying upon the principles contained in our immortal Declaration of Independence, inspired by the pen of Thomas Jefferson, and also the > first article to the amendment of the constitution of the United States protecting 'freedom of speech.' The rightful exercise of freedom of speech is not denied, but the abuse of it. Its unrestricted license has always been open to the animadversion and condemnation of the law."

And again on the point that the Court in the case at bar should consider the motive of the defendants, and whether the acts which they claim the right to do, would, if allowed, bring about a dangerous probability that the defendants will finally effect their unlawful purpose, Judge Jackson's language in the Haggerty case (116 Fed. 516, 517) is likewise in point:

> "It is apparent that, if these agitators are permitted to interfere with the orderly, well-disposed miners who are anxious to work, and contented with the wages they receive, in the end this contented class of miners would, through fear, intimidation, as well as threats, be induced to throw down their shovels and picks, and cease to work in the mines," &c.

In the case of Moran v. Dunphy (1901), 177 Mass. 485, 59 N. E. 125, 52 L. R. A. 115, Mr. Justice Holmes, of this Court, but then Chief Justice of the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court, rendering the opinion of the Court, said (52 L. R. A. 116, 117):

> "We apprehend that there no longer is any difficulty in recognizing that a right to be protected from malicious interference may be incident to a right arising out of a contract, although a contract, so far as performance is concerned, imposes a duty only on the promisor. Again, in the case of a contract of employment, even when the employment is at will, the fact that the employer is free from liability for discharging the plaintiff does not carry with it immunity to the defendant who has controlled the employer's action to the plaintiff's harm. The notion that the employer's immunity must be a non-conductor, so far as any remoter liability was concerned, troubled some of the judges in Allen v. Flood (1898), A. C. 1, but is disposed of for this commonwealth by the cases cited. See also May v. Wood, 172 Mass. 11, 14, 15, 51 N. E. 191. So again, it may be taken to be settled by Plant v. Woods, 176 Mass. 492, 501, 502, 51 L. R. A. 339, 57 N. E. 1011, that motives may determine the question of liability; that while intentional interference of the kind supposed may be privileged if for certain purposes, yet, if due only to malevolence, it must be answered for. On that point the judges were of one mind. See 176 Mass. 504, 51 L. R. A. 344, 57 N. E. 1011. Finally, we see no sound distinction between persuading by malevolent advice and accomplishing the same result by falsehood or putting in fear. In all cases the employer is controlled through motives created by the defendant for the unprivileged purpose. It appears to us not to matter which motive is relied upon. If accomplishing the end by one of them is a wrong to the plaintiff, accomplishing it by either of the others must be equally a wrong."

And right here, we want to emphasize the point of view of Chief Justice Holmes that persuading by malevolent advice is equivalent to force or fraud. 6 Current Law 1708. We want further to call the attention of the Court to the fact that this case of Moran v. Dunphy is cited favorably and relied upon by the Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia in the case of Thacker Coal & Coke Company v. Burke et als.

With the foregoing, and for the present, we dispose of—

(3) a. Certain facts in this case, which show the motive of defendants, and, therefore, should be considered by the Court.

And we will, therefore, next take up—

(3) b. PLAINTIFF'S RIGHTS AND DEFENDANTS' RIGHTS UNDER THOSE FACTS.

The plaintiff's rights, briefly stated, are to be let alone in the conduct of its lawful business, conducted by it in a lawful way.

The rights of the defendants are, with equal brevity, to be found in the injunction that they shall mind their own business, and shall let plaintiff alone.

(3) c. ARE THE ACTS OF THE DEFENDANTS HERETOFORE COMMITTED, WHICH HAVE INJURED PLAINTIFF, AND ARE THE ACTS, WHICH THEY DESIGN TO DO, AND WHICH WILL LIKEWISE INJURE PLAINTIFF, JUSTIFIED?

In addition to what we have already said on that subject, we ask attention to another feature—namely: What is the foundation of defendants' liability?

Dr. Bigelow, in his work on the Law of Torts, discusses this question, and says: (page 264) "No one would deny, that the defendant owes to the plaintiff in such a case the duty to use no wrongful means to procure the breach."

And then says: "Analogy is clearly in favor of treating persuasion to break a contract as too dangerous to the public welfare to be permitted."

While concluding his discussion he says: "Why should there not be a legal duty not to persuade a man to break his contract as well as not to persuade a man to violate his duty to the State, or any other binding duty? Has the supposed distinction anything more to rest upon than the confused notion that a right in personam is inconsistent with a right in rem? But whatever may be said on analogy or on other lines, the question has been settled by the better authorities, in the struggle of the last few years, on broad lines of liability."

In the reign of Edward III. of England, and as a result of the plague, known as the "Black Death," there was a scarcity of laborers, and what is known as the "Statute of Laborers" was enacted. That statute simply added to the law certain provisions in regard to harboring servants, which were at the time not of the common law. The statute was afterwards repealed. In some of the reported decisions upon labor controversies, it has been suggested that the employer has no property right in his labor, however contracted for, and, therefore, that no action can be maintained for interference with that right, and that the courts are powerless to protect an employer. And that argument is based upon the mistaken idea that whatever rights an employer has were created by the Statute of Laborers, and that those rights ceased when that statute was repealed. It is now recognized by the best text writers, and by the courts of England, the home of the common law, and by the courts of last resort in most of the States, and by the Supreme Court of the United States, as well as by lower Federal Courts that this idea is a mistake, and that it is a wrong at common law with notice to interfere in the contractual relations of others.

The relationship existing between plaintiff and plaintiff's employees is that of master and servant. Yet we do not base plaintiff's rights alone upon the ground that the defendants are interfering with the relationship of master and servant. We base plaintiff's rights also upon the broader ground that the defendants are interfering with the contractual relations existing between plaintiff's employes and plaintiff on the one hand, and with the reciprocal contractual relations existing between the plaintiff and its employes on the other hand.

The consideration of the case on the broader ground of interference with plaintiff's contractual relations necessarily includes the question of defendants' rights to interfere in the contractual relations of master and servant. Bigelow on Torts, Eighth Edition, 257.

Defendants' liability depends upon defendants' duty. It is their duty not to intermeddle in the affairs of third persons with whose business they have no lawful concern. And in gauging the seriousness of their offence it is important to remember that the United Mine Workers, represented by these defendants, are actuated by malice in fact as well as by malice in law. Malice in fact is shown by the bill, exhibits and supporting affidavits and by the evidence introduced upon the trial. Malice in law is admitted by their contention.

In urging that malice in fact and that malice in law are properly to be considered by this Court, we follow the general rule in force in the United States Courts and in the Supreme Court of West Virginia—

Angle v. Chicago, St. P., M. & O. R. Co. (1894). 151 U. S. 1. 38 L. ed. 55. 14 S. C. 240.

Thacker Coal & Coke Company v. Burke (1906). 59 W. Va. 253. 53 S. E. 161. 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1901. 8 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 885.

West Virginia Transportation Company v. Standard Oil Company (1900). 50 W. Va. 611. 40 S. E. 591. 56 L. R. A. 804. 88 Am. St. Rep. 895.

The correctness of the rule of considering malice as the determining factor is controverted in a recent work—Cooke on the Law of Combinations, Monopolies and Labor Unions, Second Edition, 1909, 14, and the doctrine is advanced that civil liability for injury depends solely on the nature of the relation of the party doing the injury and not at all on the presence or absence of malice or malicious intent. And the author says (p. 15) "The persistence of the doctrine giving effect to malice or malicious intent as a test of liability, is undoubtedly due to the absence of a comprehension of what is the true test, which is, we submit, whether the act was the natural incident or outgrowth of some lawful relation."

If malice and malicious intent are not to be considered and if defendants' liability depends upon whether the acts done were the natural incident or outgrowth of some lawful relation, and if the right to induce plaintiff's employees to join the Union is to be justified, because the acts of inducing by reason, argument and persuasion, unaccompanied by force, fraud, intimidation, violence or coercion, are the natural incidents or outgrowth of some lawful relation—what is that relation?

The plaintiff has no relation, contractual or otherwise, with the defendants. The defendants have no relation, contractual or otherwise, with plaintiff's employes. As to plaintiff and as to plaintiff's employes, the defendants are outsiders and mere intermeddlers. There is no consent on the part of the plaintiff. There is no consent on the part of plaintiff's employes. The proceedings of the defendants, both as to the plaintiff and as to plaintiff's employes, are in invitum.

Plaintiff and plaintiff's employes have entered into a bilateral contract, under the provisions of which neither plaintiff nor plaintiff's employes are to have anything to do with defendants or with the Union which they represent. The consideration of the promise is mutual. It is coincident with the employment as to each man employed. In Wald's Pollock on Contracts, Third Edition, Williston, page 201, it is said: "The most characteristic rule in our law of consideration, and the most important for the business of life, is that mutual promises are sufficient consideration for one another." And on page 202, the author says: "The promises must be exchanged for one another at the same time, and each of them must be binding on the face of it, that is, must not be unenforceable for any intrinsic reason."

The weight of authority is that there is an equality of right in the matter of employing Union or non-union men; likewise an equality of right in employes to determine for themselves whether to work Union or non-union. And it would seem that there could be little conflict in determining the rights of all parties, if, in determining the right of Labor Unions to have all men join the Union, the common law doctrine as to monopoly were applied.

It will not do to say that the general relation of defendants as members of society justifies their effort to get plaintiff's employees to join their Union as a natural incident or outgrowth of ordinary neighborly or social intercourse. There is no case which sustains any such doctrine. The case of Boysen v. Thorn, 98 Calif. 578, 33 Pac. 492, 21 L. R. A. 233, (1893), expressly distinguished between the doctrine applied in that case and the doctrine of cases involving liability for breaches of contract between master and servant. The point made was that in breaching contracts between master and servant or between employer and employee, the wrong consisted not merely in procuring one party to a contract to break his contract, but in taking away from or depriving the master or the employer of the subject of the contract, or that which the master or employer contracted for, namely, the services of the servant or of the employe. In the case at the bar of this Court, if defendants are permitted to persuade plaintiff's employes to join their Union, then plaintiff is deprived of the services of its men as fast as it can employ them. There is no justification for any such series of acts. Defendants are not the emancipators of mankind, neither are they their brothers' keepers.

Defendants to sustain themselves must have some special relation either to the employer or to the employe. They have none to either.

If it be contended that solidarity of interest, that is, the interest of all coal miners, union and non-union, justifies them, the objection obtains that if all coal miners belonged to one union there would be a monopoly of labor in that industry. There would be unreasonable restraint and no operator could operate his mine unless he operated union. The law will not sanction such a result nor acts that with a reasonable degree of probability will bring about that result.

Solidarity of interest will not furnish any justification to the defendants as far as plaintiff is concerned, because plaintiff has no relationship of any kind whatever with defendants or with the Union represented by them.

Solidarity of interest will not furnish any justification to the defendants so far as plaintiff's employes are concerned, because plaintiff's employes have no relationship of any kind whatever with defendants or with the Union represented by them.

In point of fact, there is not even a community of interest, let alone a solidarity of interest, between the defendants and plaintiff's employes. Hence, defendants have no possible justification for the acts done nor for the acts which they now seek authority to do.

While adhering to the view that there is nothing inherently or necessarily illegal in inducing one person to refuse to deal or continue to deal with another, Cooke in his work on Law of Combinations, Monopolies and Labor Unions, page 141, adds: "On principle it would seem clear that the same doctrine should cover and apply to the case of inducing one person to refuse to continue to deal with another, as employe with employer; in other words, to quit his employment. But the accepted doctrine is otherwise and we find the prevailing rule to be that 'any person who knowingly entices away the servant of another, and thereby induces him to violate his contract with his master, or who thereby deprives the master of the services of one then actually in his service, whether under a contract to serve or not, is liable to the master for his actual loss therefrom.' "

To induce plaintiff's employes to join the Union is to induce them to place themselves in a position where they cannot perform their contract. Hence to induce them to join the Union is to induce them to quit plaintiff's employment.

In passing upon the question of justification a consideration of local law and the character of defendants' business, and the character of plaintiff's business, and of the obligation of plaintiff's employees is useful, pertinent, and proper.

The case of United States v. Moore et al. (C. C., N. D. Alabama, S. D. 1904), 129 Fed. 630, is in point. Charles Moore and five others were indicted on several counts, alleging substantially that they had conspired to intimidate one B. L. Greer, a citizen of the United States, to prevent the free exercise and enjoyment by him of a right or privilege secured to him by the Constitution and the laws of the United States, to-wit: "the right and privilege of establishing, organizing, and perfecting a local union of the United Mine Workers of America at Empire, in the county of Walker and State of Alabama," and that, in pursuance of the conspiracy, and to effect its object, the defendants unlawfully assaulted and beat said Greer, and that they assaulted him with intent to murder him by shooting at him with a pistol, &c., "for having, and because of his having exercised the right and privilege," above referred to.

In sustaining a demurrer to the indictment, Judge Jones held:

> "1. The right of a citizen to organize miners, artisans, laborers, or persons in any pursuit, as well as the right of individuals in such callings to unite for their own improvement or advancement, or for any other lawful purpose, is a fundamental right of a citizen in all free governments; but it is not a right, privilege, or immunity granted or secured to citizens of the United States, by its Constitution or laws, and is left solely to the protection of the states.
>
> "2. The fourteenth amendment of the Federal Constitution, which prohibits a state from depriving any person of his life, liberty, or property without due process of law, adds nothing to the rights of any citizen against another, but merely furnishes additional guaranties against any encroachment by the states upon the fundamental rights which belong to every citizen as a member of society.
> "3. Federal courts have no jurisdiction to punish a conspiracy to oppress and intimidate a citizen of the United States to prevent him from exercising the right to establish a miner's union in a state, in the furtherance of which defendants were alleged to have assaulted such citizen, with intent to murder him by shooting at him with a pistol; such offense being entirely within the jurisdiction of the state courts."

It is clear from this decision that the defendants have no rights under the Federal Constitution. And they have none under the federal Trades Union Act, because they have not availed themselves of that act so as to make themselves even prima facie a lawful organization under federal law.

So far as the West Virginia law is concerned, the United Mine Workers of America have no standing either. Sec. 413a1 recognizes as lawful the existence of labor unions, but the provisions of the law are of a restrictive order. And as we have said before the Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia has in the case of Thacker Coal & Coke Company v. Burke (1906), 59 W. Va. 253, held that section 413, as hereinbefore noted, does not authorize any individual, or number of individuals, to maliciously entice servants to desert service in which they are engaged, or to prevent them from engaging in such service under a contract for such service.

Section 413, Code W. Va., has been repealed, amended and re-enacted, but the present law as quoted in section 413a1 contains the language of section 413, which was passed upon by the Court in that case. Of that language the Court in that case said:

> "It does not pretend to create rights between individuals. It prohibits certain acts and the proviso simply curtails the scope of the enactment by saying that the enacting clause shall not be construed to impair any right already existing, if existing, to join the organizations therein specified or use moral suasion. It is only a curb upon the enactment. It does not affirmatively grant, create or originate those rights. It does not make them lawful, if before unlawful. And could the legislature authorize any person to violate a contract?"

In connection with the suggestion of the Court in that case, "Could the legislature authorize any person to violate a contract?" we would like, in addition to what we have said on that subject, to call the Court's attention to the antinomy which would be created by sustaining the claim of right these defendants make. It is a well established proposition of law that Courts of Equity will not enforce a contract for personal services. But while that is so, Courts of Equity do restrain the breach of a contract. Plaintiff's employes have contracted with plaintiff that while employed they will not join the Union. Plaintiff has contracted with its employes that while they and each of them are employed, it will run non-union. These negative provisions are not for personal services per se but are negative covenants which bind the contracting parties while the relationship of employer and employe exists. They are within the doctrine of Lumley v. Wagner, 21 L. J. Ch. 898, 903, 6 E. R. C. 652, Subscription ed. 1905; Singer Sewing Machine Company v. Union Buttonhole & Embroidery Company et al., 22 Fed. Cas. 220, 222, 223, Case No. 12,904; Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, Vol. 5, § 270 and note 2; Id. §§ 288, 289 and notes.

Under that law the plaintiff, if it undertook to run union in violation of its contracts with its employes, could be enjoined by them. So could plaintiff's employes be enjoined from violating their contracts. Hence, if the Court were to allow the proposed acts of these defendants it would ex necessitate rei decide that the acts of the defendants would be lawful, and that the result of the persuasion, supposing it to be successful and the men to join the Union, would as to these very employes also be lawful. Putting it another way, the Court would be saying to plaintiff's employes on behalf of the defendants—you may join the Union—and on behalf of the plaintiff it would be saying to the same employes—you must not break your contract while working for the plaintiff; therefore, you must not join the Union.

We have shown by United States v. Moore et al., 129 Fed. 630, that the United Mine Workers of America are not by the Constitution of the United States given any right to establish, organize and perfect local unions. We have also shown by Code sec. 413 and Code sec. 413a1 and by the case of Thacker Coal & Coke Company v. Burke, 59 W. Va. 253, that West Virginia law does not confer any such right. And it only remains to show the length to which Courts will go, and be within the law, in restraining others from doing what they ought not to do, where the acts to be done are an interference with the rights of third persons, with whose rights the persons enjoined have nothing whatever to do. Bigelow on Torts, Eighth ed., p. 264, says:

> "The well-established case of the right of action of a husband or wife against a third person for persuading the other party to the marriage contract to break the same by abandoning the other * * * is still not without its force as a precedent."

And along that line we want to cite the case of Ex parte Warfield (1889) 40 Texas Cr. Rep. 413 76 Am. St. Rep. 724 725 726. Judge Henderson rendering the opinion said:

> "This is an original application for a writ of habeas corpus, which grew out of contempt proceedings in the Forty-fourth judicial district court of Dallas county. It appears that Will R. Morris, as plaintiff, brought a suit against J. B. Warfield, as defendant, before Judge Richard Morgan, in the Forty-fourth judicial district court of Texas, for one hundred thousand dollars. The petition alleges a number of acts on the part of J. B. Warfield, the defendant in that suit, interfering with marital relations existing between Will R. Morris and his wife, Vivia Morris, said acts causing a partial alienation of the affections of his said wife; and further suggesting that the course of conduct of said Warfield toward the wife of said Morris, if permitted to continue unrestrained, would likely culminate in the total alienation of the affections of his said wife, and the destruction of the marital relations existing between them. And said Morris asked for a writ of injunction restraining said Warfield from visiting or associating with plaintiff's wife, or going to or near her at a certain house, No. 129 Marion street, or any other house or place in the city of Dallas or state of Texas where his said wife might be, and that he be restrained from writing or speaking to her, or in any manner, either directly or indirectly, communicating with her, by word, letter, writing, sign, or symbol, and also asking that his agents and employees be restrained from the like, etc.; and that said Warfield and his agents and servants be restrained from interfering with plaintiff in his peaceful efforts to seek, talk, write, or communicate with his said wife, etc. The writ was granted on the 23d of February, 1899, and was served on Warfield on the following day, the 24th of February. On the 9th of March following, plaintiff sued out an attachment against said Warfield, alleging that he had violated said writ of injunction, and made a motion for rule against him for contempt for a violation thereof. Subsequently Warfield was brought before the court, and the matter of said contempt was tried before the Hon. Richard Morgan. A number of legal questions were raised, and the issue of fact was submitted before said judge as to whether or not said injunction had been violated. It was shown, in fact it was conceded by said Warfield, that on two occasions after the issuance and service of the said writ of injunction, he had met and talked with the wife of Morris. He claimed, however, that these meetings were casual, and that he indulged in no conversation with her violative of the spirit of said injunction, or calculated to make a breach of the marital relations existing between Morris and his wife. It is further shown that he went to the house, 129 Marion street, where the wife of plaintiff, Morris, was, but claimed that he had the right to go there, that being his boarding house, etc. The court, Judge Morgan presiding, adjudged Warfield in contempt of court, and assessed a fine against him of one hundred dollars and three days' imprisonment in the county jail. From which judgment Warfield, the defendant in said proceedings and the applicant here, sued out a writ of habeas corpus; and he claims now, as he did before the lower court, that the court, in granting the said writ of injunction, had no power or authority to enjoin him from speaking to, or talking with, Mrs. Morris, or from visiting the house, 129 Marion street; that the exercise of said power was beyond the jurisdiction of a court of equity, and was not merely irregular, but void, and imposed upon him no duty to obey the same. And he now insists that the use of said power by the court was violative of the Constitution and the fundamental law of the land, in that it was an effort on the part of the court to restrain the freedom of speech and of locomotion, and the rights of the defendant in the pursuit of happiness. Furthermore, it is contended that, although the matters complained about might be regarded as a violation of the letter of the injunction, it was not a violation of its spirit, and the court had no power to coin a criminal offense out of the acts of the applicant, and to punish him as for a contempt."

Judge Henderson held that the applicant was not entitled to be relieved, and ordered that he be remanded to the custody of the sheriff of Dallas county and undergo the sentence imposed upon him by the judge of the lower court.

Ex parte Warfield was cited with approval in the case of United States v. Milwaukee Refrigerator Transit Company et al. (C. C., E. D. Wisconsin, 1906) 145 Fed. 1010, heard before Grosscup, Baker, Seaman and Kohlsaat, Circuit Judges, Judge Baker rendering the opinion.

In connection with the defendants' justification, we now ask the Court's attention to two propositions advanced by the defendants:

First. That the injunction granted imperils the existence of Labor Unions, and that no case of like kind can be found in any decision of any English, nor of any American court.

Second. That public policy recognizes the benefit of Labor Unions and, incidental to their existence and necessary to their growth, the right of organizers to organize.

On the first proposition, namely: that the injunction granted imperils the existence of Labor Unions, and that no case of like kind can be found in any decision of any English, nor of any American Court, we would say that the lack of a precedent does not put a limitation on plaintiff's rights.

We might answer the objection in another way by saying that there could not have been any decision denying such rights as are now claimed by the defendants, unless the propositions the defendants now contend for had been made the basis of an appeal to some Court. Not only is there no case which gives to defendants the rights they now ask, but there is no case in which even such a contention has been raised.

As a matter of fact the injunction does not prevent men joining Labor Unions. It prevents Labor Unions organizing non-union mines where the non-union mines are working under contract between employer and employe that the employe shall not join the Union, and where there is a reciprocal contract on the part of the employer that the mine will be run non-union.

If the doctrines laid down in plaintiff's case are availed of by employers generally and contractual rights created, and those rights enforced by the courts, a limitation will be put upon the growth, practices, and power of labor unions. But that result could not be detrimental to the prosperity of the country. It would lessen the number of "strikes," sympathetic and otherwise, and would promote industrial peace, because it would emphasize and restore to prominence the right of the employer to employ whom he pleased and of the employe to work for whom he pleased. And this right has been defined to be included within the term "liberty."

While no case has been found on all fours with plaintiff's case, the cases we have cited in support thereof will, on examination, be found to be inter-related by the points decided and by the reasons assigned in support thereof.

On the second proposition, namely: that public policy recognizes the benefit of Labor Unions and incidental to their existence and necessary to their growth the right of organizers to organize, we would say that the injunction does not limit the right of the Union, nor the right of the organizer, to induce men to join a Labor Union, provided the men sought to be persuaded are not under contract not to join the Union.

Beach on Monopolies and Industrial Trusts. § 14, page 38, says: "On all sides it is accepted that public policy has a standing in a court of equity, and that whatever is clearly in contravention of its claim is illegal and void. Undoubtedly the application of this rule is attended with grave difficulties, and it should be administered only with great deliberation, and in the exercise of a thoroughly judicial temper. The indefiniteness and uncertainty of the idea on which the rule is based, and which is the ground of the difficulty of its application, renders it especially liable to abuse."

The Supreme Court of the United States has this to say on that subject: "This Court can know nothing of public policy except from the constitution and the laws, and the course of administration and decision. It has no legislative powers. It cannot amend or modify any legislative acts. It cannot examine questions as expedient or inexpedient, as politic or impolitic; considerations of that sort must, in general, be addressed to the Legislature. Questions of policy determined there are concluded here."

License Tax Cases (1867). 5 Wall. 462, 469. 18 Law. ed. 497, 500.

And in the case of the Baltimore & Ohio Southwestern Railway Company v. Voight (1900), 176 U. S. 498, 505; 44 L. ed. 560, 565; 20 S. C. 385, Mr. Justice Shiras, in delivering the opinion of the Supreme Court, said:

> "It must not be forgotten that the right of private contract is no small part of the liberty of the citizen, and that the usual and most important function of courts of justice is rather to maintain and enforce contracts than to enable parties thereto to escape from their obligation on the pretext of public policy, unless it clearly appear that they contravene public right or the public welfare. It was well said by Sir George Jessel, M. R., in Printing & N. Registering Co. v. Sampson, L. R. 19 Eq. 465: 'It must not be forgotten that you are not to extend arbitrarily those rules which say that a given contract is void as being against public policy, because if there is one thing which more than another public policy requires, it is that men of full age and competent understanding shall have the utmost liberty of contracting, and that their contracts, when entered into freely and voluntarily, shall be held sacred, and shall be enforced by courts of justice. Therefore, you have this paramount public policy to consider,—that you are not lightly to interfere with this freedom of contract."

In this case of Baltimore & Ohio Southwestern Railway Company v. Voight, the question was, whether an express company's agent, who rode in an express car, and who had made a specific agreement waiving all right of damages against the railroad company, in case of accident, could avoid his contract, on the ground that it was against public policy to allow the making of any such contract.

With such a holding against one of the parties to a contract, how much stronger is a case where the parties to the contract are both satisfied, and where the only trouble which arises is that brought about by intermeddlers. Intermeddling is not an approved, nor a recognized, right under any law, nor under any decision of any court that we have been able to discover.

In the case of Crump v. Commonwealth (1888), 84 Va. 927; 6 S. E. 620, 628, Fauntleroy, Judge, rendering the opinion of the Court, said:

> "Every man has the right to work for whom he pleases; and for any price he can obtain; and he has the right to deal with and associate with whom he chooses, or to let severely alone, arbitrarily and contemptuously, if he will, anybody and everybody upon earth."

Affecting defendants' justification and related to the foundation of their liability, we ask attention to one other thought: their conspiracy against plaintiff's right to run its own business in its own way, and within the law.

By the claim defendants make they ask the Court to legalize "boycotting."

"Boycotting" is defined to be an organized effort to exclude a person from business relations with others, and thereby force him, from fear of resulting injury, to submit to dictation in the management of his affairs. See Casey v. Cincinnati Typographical Union No. 3, et als. (C. C. S. D. Ohio W. D. January 31, 1891), 45 Fed. 135, 143. Boycotting may involve only persuasion, or it may involve intimidation and other acts which tend to violence. The defendants repudiate fraud, force, violence, intimidation and coercion; but they plead for the right to use argument, reason and persuasion. The defendants ask the right to persuade all men not to work for plaintiff. This species of boycotting is simply an unlawful means to an unlawful end, because their Constitutions say: "One of the objects of this organization is to unite all employes in and around the coal mines of Ohio and the Panhandle District of West Virginia." "All men are eligible and must be members of the United Mine Workers of America who work in and around the mines." And their obligation of membership says: "As the mine workers of the entire country are competitors in the labor world, I promise to cease work at any time I am called upon by the organization to do so." If this right be conceded and if the result be accomplished, plaintiff would not be able to employ labor, unless it ran union. Failing to run union, and without labor, it would have to go out of business. So that the proposition, thus involved in defendants' claim of right to do the acts enjoined, amounts to their asking the Court for authority to put plaintiff out of business. And upon what ground? Because plaintiff refuses to unionize.

This subject of "boycotting" has been before the courts of the country many times. Most lately and prominently in the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Loewe et al. v. Lawlor, et al. (1908), 208 U. S. 274; 28 S. C. 301; 52 L. ed. 488, and in the case of Buck's Stove & Range Company v. American Federation of Labor.

In 1887, in the case of State v. Glidden and others, 55 Conn. 46, 8 Atl. 890, 894, 895, the Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut, said of boycotting—"It is a dangerous instrumentality to use; and if those instigating and resorting to it do not of their own accord take notice of its peril, and voluntarily abandon its use, as we sincerely hope they will, the courts at no distant day will be called upon to recognize its dangerous tendency, and treat it accordingly."

In the case of State v. Glidden and others the Carrington Publishing Company had in their employ a number of printers known as "non-union" men, or "rats." The Typographical Union, the Knights of Labor, the Trades Council, and other affiliated organizations waited upon the company, and demanded that their office be made a "union" office within twenty-four hours. Upon refusal the company was boycotted. Criminal prosecution for conspiracy was instituted against Glidden and others. Plea, not guilty. Verdict, guilty. The defendants appealed.

In discussing the case, the Court said:

> "Now, if we look at this transaction as it appears on the face of this information, we shall be satisfied that the defendants' purpose was to deprive the Carrington Publishing Company of its liberty to carry on its business in its own way, although in doing so it interfered with no right of the defendant. The motive was a selfish one,—to gain an advantage unjustly, and at the expense of others,—and therefore the act was legally corrupt. As a means of accomplishing the purpose, the parties intended to harm the Carrington Publishing Company, and therefore it was malicious. It seems strange that in this day and this free country—a country in which law interferes so little with the liberty of the individual—that it should be necessary to announce from the bench that every man may carry on his business as he pleases, may do what he will with his own so long as he does nothing unlawful, and acts with due regard to the rights of others; and that the occasion for such an announcement should be, not an attempt by government to interfere with the rights of the citizen, nor by the rich and powerful to oppress the poor, but an attempt by a large body of working men to control, by means little if any better than force, the action of employers. The defendants and their associates said to the Carrington Publishing Company: 'You shall discharge the men you have in your employ, and you shall hereafter employ only such men as we shall name. It is true, we have no interest in your business, we have no capital invested therein, we are in nowise responsible for its losses or failures, we are not directly benefited by its success, and we do not participate in its profits; yet we have a right to control its management, and compel you to submit to our dictation.' The bare assertion of such a right is startling. The two alleged rights cannot possibly co-exist. One or the other must yield. If the defendants have the right which they claim, then all business enterprises are alike subject to their dictation. No one is safe in engaging in business, for no one knows whether his business affairs are to be directed by intelligence or ignorance,—whether law and justice will protect the business, or brute force, regardless of law, will control it; for it must be remembered that the exercise of the power, if conceded, will by no means be confined to the matter of employing help. Upon the same principle, and for the same reasons, the right to determine what business others shall engage in, when and where it shall be carried on, etc. will be demanded and must be conceded. The principle, if it once obtains a foothold, is aggressive, and is not easily checked. It thrives on what it feeds, and is insatiate in its demands. More requires more. If a large body of irresponsible men demand and receive power outside of law, over and above law, it is not to be expected that they will be satisfied with a moderate and reasonable use of it. All history proves that abuses and excesses are inevitable. The exercise of irresponsible power by men, like the taste of human blood by tigers, creates an unappeasable appetite for more. Business men have a general understanding of their rights under the law, and have some degree of confidence that the government, through its courts, will be able to protect those rights. This confidence is the corner-stone of all business; but if their rights are such only as a secret and irresponsible organization is willing to concede to them, and will receive only such protection as such an organization is willing to give, where is that confidence which is essential to the prosperity of the country?

"Again, if the alleged right is conceded to the defendants, a similar right must be conceded to the promoters of the Carrington Publishing Company, and those with whom they may associate. Otherwise all men are not equal before the law. It logically follows that they, in turn, may control the business matters of the defendants, may determine what trade or occupation they may follow, whether to work in this establishment or in that, or in none at all. Obviously, such conflicting claims, in the absence of law, can lead to but one result, and that will be determined by brute force. It would be an instance of the survival, not necessarily of the fittest, but of the strongest. That would be subversive, not only of all business, but also of law, and of the government itself. The end would be anarchy, pure and simple.

"Once more. Suppose the government should assert the right in the same manner to regulate and control the business affairs of the Carrington Publishing Company and other business enterprises, how long would the people submit to it? And yet the exercise of such a power by government would be far more tolerable than its exercise would be by secret organizations, however wise and intelligent such organizations may be; for government is established by the people and for the people, and is responsible to all the people. If it abuses its power, the people have the remedy in their own hands; but if a secret organization, in the management of which the people at large have no voice, abuses its power, and is not amenable to law, where is the remedy?"

SECOND.—THE REMEDY.

For the wrongs done to plaintiff the defendants are answerable.

First. Criminally by indictment for conspiracy at common law.

Second. Civilly by action at law for damages.

Third. By injunction to restrain them from doing acts similar to those heretofore done, and from further oppressing plaintiff in its pursuit of its lawful business conducted in a lawful way.

First Remedy.

INDICTMENT FOR CONSPIRACY AT COMMON LAW.

On this we ask attention to the case of — Regina v. Rowlands et als. Queen's Bench (1851). 17 Ad. & El. 671.

Syl. in full.

"On an indictment charging defendants with conspiring to force workmen hired and employed by P. in his business of a japanner to depart from their said employment.

By unlawfully 'molesting' the said workmen.
By unlawfully 'using threats' to the said workmen.
By unlawfully 'intimidating' the said workmen.
By unlawfully 'molesting' P.
By unlawfully 'obstructing' P., so carrying on his said business, and the workmen so hired, etc.

Held, that these counts were sufficiently full and certain, and that the means by which the conspiracy was to be carried on were well stated in the words of Stat. 6 G. 4 c. 129 § 3.

Other counts charged a conspiracy to force P. to make an alteration in the mode of conducting his business.

By 'molesting' P.

By 'obstructing' P. by inducing and persuading workmen hired and employed by him in his business to leave their said hiring and employment.

Held good counts.

Another count (framed with reference to Stat. G. 4 c. 34 § 3) charged that divers, to-wit, etc. persons, being artificers, had contracted with P. to serve him as workmen and artificers in his said trade and business for certain times agreed upon, and had entered into such service: and that defendants conspired by divers subtle means and devices to induce and persuade such artificers, so having contracted, etc., and so having entered, etc., unlawfully to absent themselves from the said service without the consent of P. before the terms of the respective contracts were completed.

Another count stated that H. (an individual workman) had in like manner contracted with P., and entered etc., and that defendants conspired, by divers subtle means and devices and illegal acts and practices, and by intoxicating the said H., to induce and persuade H., etc., (as in the preceding count).

Held good counts.

Other counts charged: That defendants, intending to oppress P. in his said trade, conspired by divers subtle means and devices, and by intoxicating and thereby rendering senseless the workmen of P. in his said trade, to convey to a distance and carry away the said workmen, and thereby prevent them from continuing to work for P. in his said trade.

And that defendants conspired, by divers subtle, etc., and by illegal acts and practices, and by molesting and rendering intoxicated the workmen employed by P., and inducing them to depart from the said employment and break their contracts with P., to force and compel P. to alter and thereby increase the amount of wages which he paid to his workmen.

Held good counts.

Other counts alleged:

That defendants conspired unlawfully to intimidate, prejudice, and oppress P. in his trade and occupation as a japanner, and to prevent his workmen from continuing to work for him in his said trade.

That defendants conspired by divers subtle means and devices and wicked acts and practices to injure and oppress P. in his trade, business, etc. of etc., and to induce his workmen to depart from their hiring and employment with P. before the period of their agreement with him was completed. And

That defendants conspired unlawfully to intimidate, prejudice and oppress P. in his trade and occupation of etc., and to entice and seduce away the workmen of P. from the employment of P., and thereby to injure and oppress him in his said trade.

Semble, that these were bad counts, as being too vague."

This indictment, on conviction of defendants, was removed from the lower court to the Queen's Bench by certiorari.

After carefully and exhaustively reviewing the facts and the law the Queen's Bench held as shown in the Syl. and sentenced the defendants to three months' imprisonment.

In a note on pages 686 and 687 (17 Ad. & El.) to this report of this case is the following—

"(b) One ground of the motion for new trial was that Erle, J., in summing up, had directed the jury as follows:

The law is clear that workmen have a right to combine for their own protection, and to obtain such wages as they choose to agree to demand. I say nothing at present as to the legality of other persons, not workmen, combining with them to assist in that purpose. As far as I know, there is no objection, in point of law, to it: and it is not necessary to go into that matter: but I consider the law to be clear so far, only, as while the purpose of the combination is to obtain a benefit for the parties who combine; a benefit which by law they can claim. I make that remark because a combination for the purpose of injuring another is a combination of a different nature, directed personally against the party to be injured: and the law allowing them to combine for the purpose of obtaining a lawful benefit to themselves gives no sanction to combinations which have for their immediate purpose the hurt of another.

The rights of workmen are conceded: but the exercise of free will and freedom of action, within the limits of the law, is also secured equally to the masters. The intention of the law is at present to allow either of them to follow the dictates of their own will, with respect to their own actions, and their own property; and either, I believe, has a right to study to promote his own advantage, or to combine with others to promote their mutual advantage.

His Lordship then said that, in this case, upon undisputed evidence, there had been a combination to force Messrs. Perry to agree to a uniform book of prices: That, upon the facts before the jury, they would have to give their opinion upon three classes of counts, charging conspiracies: (1) to prevent workmen from working for the prosecutors, by intimidating the workmen: (2) to force the assent of the prosecutors to certain alterations, by intimidating the prosecutors: (3) to induce workmen to leave the prosecutors' employment, contrary to their contract: and he stated that if the jury thought these counts sustained by the evidence, they should convict them."

He then added:

> "But, supposing any of the defendants are acquitted as to all those classes, and you should still be of opinion that a combination existed for the purpose of obstructing Messrs. Perry in carrying on their business, and forcing them to consent to this book of prices, and, in pursuance of that concert, they persuaded the free men and gave money to the free men to leave the employ of Messrs. Perry, the purpose being to obstruct them in their manufacture and to injure them in their business, and so force their consent, with no other result to the parties combining than gratifying ill will, I am of opinion that that would also be a violation of the law, and warrant a conviction upon the counts directed against that form of offence."

It was contended, on behalf of the defendants, that this language of the learned Judge led the jury to suppose that, although the combination were for a legitimate object, yet, if the means to be used would have the effect of obstructing the prosecutors in carrying on their business, it was an indictable conspiracy; whereas, if the object of the workmen was to enforce their own rights, they were justified in combining to do so, though the effect were an obstruction of the prosecutors' business. But the learned Judge stated that his words had no such meaning; and the Court saw no objection to the summing up.

This case was an indictment according to the language of the Statute, but the offence (conspiracy) being a common law offence the Court held that it was sufficient to follow the language of the Act of Parliament.

This holding came upon the suggestion that some of the counts did not disclose the nature of the molestation or intimidation by which the conspiracy was to take effect (686). The Court said on this point:

> "But this is quite unnecessary. The words of the Legislature are used; the terms in question have a meaning stamped upon them by the Act 6 G. 4 c. 129 § 3; and we must take it that they are used here in that sense. And they are not employed as describing the substantive offence for which the indictment is preferred: that offence consists in the conspiracy, which is a misdemeanor at common law" (686).

The case of Regina v. Rowlands, 17 Ad. & El. 671, has been repeatedly judicially noticed in England, and its doctrine has been repeatedly applied, and never criticised, doubted, modified, or reversed.

This law is unaffected in West Virginia by § 41331.

Second Remedy.

Action at Law for Damages.

The old common law of England is the law of West Virginia on this subject.

In England, however, the Trade Disputes Act of 1906 has made some change. In that country the effort for years has been to create for labor a paramount estate. The Trade Disputes Act of 1906 was the culmination of the effort. And while that Act went further than we think a similar Act could constitutionally go in this country, under the Constitution of the United States and its amendments, and under the Constitution of West Virginia, still for acts such as these defendants have done, they would even under the 1906 Trade Disputes Act be liable. And it will not be forgotten that defendants are sued individually, as well as officially.

Sustaining this, we ask attention to two recent cases—one of them, Bussy v. The Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants and Bell, K. B. Div. (1908), 24 T. L. R. 437; and the other of them, Smithies v. National Association of Operative Plasterers, and others, 1 K. B. Div. (1909) 310.

Bussy v. The Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants and Bell, 24 T. L. R. 437, holds:

> "s. 4 of the Trade Disputes Act, 1906, is general in its application, and protects a trade union against any action of tort, and is not limited to a tortious act arising out of a trade dispute. Therefore, an action for malicious prosecution will not lie against a trade union.
> An action will lie against a member or official of a trade union for a tort committed by him when acting on behalf of himself and all other members of the union, s. 4 only preventing him from being so sued as to render the trade union as such and its funds liable for the tortious act."

In deciding this case, Justice Darling said (p. 437):

> "From the humiliating position of being on a level with other lawful associations of his Majesty's subjects the Statute of 1906 has relieved all registered trade unions, and they are now super legem, just as the Medieval Emperor was super grammaticam. The defendant society are, therefore, entitled to judgment."

In this case the defense went so far as to claim that the 1906 Statute exempted the officials of labor unions from all liability for their acts, criminal as well as civil. But Justice Darling replied that the language of the Act was not so clear as to require that and that if such were the law then in a union where all the members might be officials they could under that construction of the Statute and with impunity and without fear, or liability for punishment commit every crime in the calendar known to the law.

Smithies v. National Association of Operative Plasterers, and others, 1 K. B. Div. (1909) 310, holds:

> "The Trade Disputes Act, 1906, s. 4, is not retrospective so as to prevent the further maintenance of an action against a trade union which was commenced before the passing of the Act.
>
> "Two workmen, members of a trade union, who repectively had entered into contracts with an employer to serve him for a term of years, broke their contracts before the passing of the Trade Disputes Act, 1906, by striking, together with others in the same employ and continuing on strike, during the currency of the periods for which they had resepctively contracted to serve. The trade union had originally sanctioned the strike in ignorance of the existence of the before-mentioned contracts, but subsequently gave the workmen strike pay, after they became aware of those contracts, in order to keep the workmen out on strike:
>
> "Held, that the trade union, by procuring a continuing breach of contract by the workmen, had rendered themselves liable in damages to the employer."

Third Remedy.

INJUNCTION.

We claim that defendants are not plaintiff's competitors. And we also claim that if they are in any sense competitors, they are not entitled to bring about breaches of contracts which plaintiff has with its employes. Even competition does not admit of that.

Illustrative of that branch of the law, we cite the case of—

> The American Law Book Company v. The Edward Thompson Company. (Supreme Court, New York, 1903). 41 Misc. 396.

Bischoff, J., in that case, said:

> "By preliminary injunction, in an action for injunctive relief, the plaintiff seeks to restrain the defendant from making agreements with subscribers to the plaintiff's encyclopedia, whereby the defendant undertakes to indemnify these subscribers against claims for damages for their breach of contract in declining to receive and pay for the plaintiff's books, and from conducting and defraying the expenses of the defense to any action brought against the subscriber by the plaintiff.
> "The complaint alleges that these agreements have been systematically offered by the defendant to the plaintiff's subscribers for the purpose of causing them to subscribe to the defendant's encyclopedia and to repudiate their subscriptions for the work published by the plaintiff, and the allegations further disclose the making of intentional misrepresentations by the defendant to these subscribers, as to the relative merits of the encyclopedias, for the purpose of inducing the breach of contract.
> "The defendant admits the making of the agreements in question, but asserts that the plaintiff has no remedy in equity upon the allegations of the complaint, the contention being that the plaintiff has his remedy at law for each contract broken; that the party to that contract has the right to break it and pay damages, and that, what the party can do, another person may ask him to do without restraint by injunction. It is also argued that the cases in which an injunction has been granted to prevent the solicitation of a breach of contract are found to have involved only contracts for personal services, and that there is no precedent for such an injunction as the plaintiff seeks. If there be no exact precedent for this injunction, none is needed. The complaint avers, and the affidavits support the averment, that the defendant is engaged in an attempt to obtain business which the plaintiff has secured, having no regard to fairness of competition, but with resort to trick and device.

"Whether the subscribers are in each instance actually led by the defendant's misrepresentations to break the particular contracts is not important, and is not an essential averment of the complaint. Intentional false statements, made with a view to obstruct the plaintiff's business and to divert it to the defendant, are charged, and the solicitation of the subscriber's breach of contract is but a more active step in the same scheme of unfair competition.

"The fraudulent intent followed to fruition in the actual inducement of persons dealing with the plaintiff to break their contracts for the intended benefit of the defendant and to the intended injury of the plaintiff is the basis of the defendant's wrong—a wrong which our system of remedial justice recognizes as the subject of relief. Rice v. Manley, 66 N. Y. 82; Rich v. N. Y. C. & H. R. R. Co., 87 Id. 392. And see Bowen v. Hall, 6 Q. B. Div. 333.

"That an action for damages would not afford an adequate remedy is obvious. The loss of business and the injury to business reputation resulting from the defendant's acts of obstruction, and from the consequent litigation between the plaintiff and its delinquent subscribers, could not be estimated nor proven with any degree of certainty for the purposes of a recovery; nor could the plaintiff properly estimate the additional burden of the future litigation with subscribers, whose defense would (as is to be inferred from the past) be conducted by the defendant at great pains and expense, bearing no relation to the amount of the claim, but solely in the interest of obstruction and for advertising purposes.

"The invasion of a legal right being apparent and the inadequacy of relief at law being clear, a case for injunctive relief is made out, and, indeed, direct authority for an injunction upon a very similar state of facts is not wanting, Stoddard v. Key, 62 How. Pr. 137."

For an additional injunction labor case applicable to these defendants as intermeddlers, we cite

The W. P. Davis Machine Company v. Harry Robinson, individually, and as President, etc., et al. (Supreme Court, New York, 1903). 41 Misc. 329. 84 N. Y. Supp. 837.

Nash, J., said (41 Misc. 330):

"This action is brought to restrain the defendant Robinson and the Rochester City Lodge No. 93, of the International Association of Machinists, its officers, agents, members and servants, from interfering with the business of the plaintiff."

And again on the same page 330, said:

"The allegations of the complaint supported by affidavits upon which the preliminary injunction was granted are to the effect that, in March last, the defendant union, through its executive committee and its business agent, presented to the plaintiff for signature a contract which, among other things, provided that the plaintiff would be permitted to employ only machinists in good standing with the International Association of Machinists; and that no piece work or premium system, a system which was in vogue in the plaintiff's factory, should be allowed. The plaintiff refused to sign the proposed contract, and on the eleventh day of April the defendant union ordered a strike and ordered all members of its Lodge No. 93, who were in the employment of the plaintiff, to leave its factory in a body, and in obedience to such order the members of the defendant union on that day quit the plaintiff's employment. That at that time the plaintiff had in its employ over one hundred men, some sixty of whom were members of the defendant union. That the greater portion of the other employes of the plaintiff, who were not members of the union, left with the strikers. That the plaintiff thereafter, with such men as could be secured from Rochester and other places, and such of its employes as remained, has since attempted to continue its business."

Nash, J., further said: (41 Misc. 332)

"The defendants concede that prior to the granting of the injunction members of the union were stationed in and about the plaintiff's factory, morning, noon and night, when men employed by the plaintiff were going and coming from their work, for the purpose of persuading, and that they did persuade and endeavor to get the persons employed by the plaintiff, who had taken the places of the strikers, to leave the employment of the plaintiff. And it is insisted upon this motion that defendants have that right, and that they may by advice and persuasion induce the plaintiff's employees to leave the employment of the plaintiff. In other words, deprive the plaintiff of the means of carrying on its business, unless it accedes to the demands of the defendant. There is no question of wages involved in the strike. The plaintiff was paying its employes full union wages. The strike was ordered because the plaintiff refused to sign an agreement that it would not employ any but members of the union, and refused to discard the premium system in its factory.

"It has not yet been held by the Courts of our State and I am not prepared to hold, that a business carried on in a lawful way may be so interfered with, merely because its owner refuses the dictation of the labor union as to the method in which the business shall be conducted or carried on. What means when assembled and co-operating together persons employed in any calling, trade or handicraft, may adopt, for the purpose of obtaining an advance in the rate of wages or compensation, or of maintaining such rate, under the provisions of the Penal Code, has not been fully defined. In one respect it has been found necessary to modify the provisions of the Code as to the right impliedly given. An amendment has been enacted which provides that a person who, either by himself, or with another, obstructs or annoys a member of the National Guard, or his employer, in respect of his trade, business or employment, because said member of said National Guard is such member, is guilty of a misdemeanor.

"In the case of Curran v. Galen, 152 N. Y. 33, it is held that, 'The organization or co-operation of workingmen is not of itself against any public policy, and must be regarded as having the sanction of law, when it is for such legitimate purpose as that of obtaining an advance in the rate of wages or compensation, or of maintaining such rate.'

The Court in rendering its decision there said:

"'In the general consideration of the subject, it must be premised that the organization, or the co-operation, of workingmen is not against any public policy. Indeed, it must be regarded as having the sanction of law, when it is for such legitimate purposes as that of obtaining an advance in the rate of wages or compensation, or of maintaining such rate. Penal Code § 170. It is proper and praiseworthy, and, perhaps, falls within that general view of human society, which perceives an underlying law that men should unite to achieve that which each by himself cannot achieve; or can achieve less readily. But the social principle which justifies such organizations is departed from, when they are so far extended in their operation as either to intend, or to accomplish, injury to others. Public policy and the interests of society favor the utmost freedom in the citizen to pursue his lawful trade or calling, and if the purpose of an organization or combination of workingmen be to hamper, or to restrict, that freedom, and, through contracts or arrangements with employers, to coerce other workingmen to become members of the organization and to come under its rules and conditions, under the penalty of the loss of their position, and of deprivation of employment, then that purpose seems clearly unlawful and militates against the spirit of our government and the nature of our institutions.'

"'In the course of its opinion the Court cited with approval the case of Regina v. Rowlands, 17 Ad. & El. (N. S.) 671, where the Court of Queen's Bench, upon motion for a new trial for misdirection of the jury by Mr. Justice Erle, below, approved of his charge, in which he instructed the jury that 'a combination for the purpose of injuring another is a combination of a different nature, directed personally against the party to be injured, and the law allowing them to combine * * * gives no sanction to combinations which have for their immediate purpose the hurt of another. The rights of workingmen are conceded; but the exercise of free will and freedom of action within the limits of the law is also secured equally to the masters. The intention of the law is, at present, to allow either of them to follow the dictates of their own will with respect to their own actions, and their own property, and either, I believe, has the right to study to promote his own advantage, or to combine with others to promote their mutual advantage.'

"The distinction is plain. The acts of persons combining and confederating for the purpose of increasing their wages may be lawful, while combinations and acts which have for their objects and purpose injury merely to the business of another, without any pecuniary advantage to the persons so combining may be unlawful.

"The English case is in point. There the question involved was of the right by combination to prevent certain workingmen from working for their employers, and thereby to compel the latter to make an alteration in the mode of conducting their business, precisely the question here, the object of the defendant being to compel the plaintiff to change its method of business in such a manner as will conform to the requirements of the defendant union not in the matter of wages. It seems that the common-law right of action for enticing away from the master a servant has not been taken away, unless possibly for the purpose of obtaining an advance in or maintaining the rate of wages; hence when the rights of the master are unlawfully interfered with and there is not an adequate remedy at law, equity will take jurisdiction by injunction."

"The jurisdiction of a court of equity to enjoin interferences with property rights is not destroyed by the fact that they are accompanied by or are violations of the criminal law."

Actions at law against the defendants for damages would be inadequate; a multiplicity of suits would be required.

Actions at law against employes who might break their contracts and join the Union would also be inadequate; and a multiplicity of suits against them would also be required.

The plain fact is that plaintiff's right to do business is at stake. With the injunctive fangs of the law fastened in them, defendants have been letting plaintiff alone. And plaintiff is running its business lawfully, peacefully, and with satisfaction to itself and to its employes, who are satisfied with their wages and with their work.

Will this Court unleash defendants?

CONCLUSION.

We have now considered plaintiff's case along the following lines—

First. The Wrong.

(1) The Plaintiff's Rights.

(1)a. Is plaintiff's business legitimate?

(1)b. What are plaintiff's rights in the conduct of its business?

(2) The Defendants' Rights.

(2)a. Are the defendants engaged in a legitimate business?

(2)b. What rights have the defendants in the conduct of their business?

(2)b. 1. If the United Mine Workers are an unlawful body.

(2)b. 2. If the United Mine Workers are a lawful body.

(2)b. 2x. Defendants' permissive rights.

(2)b. 2y. Plaintiff's affirmative rights which explain, limit, or modify defendants' rights.

(3) Salient Points Which Differentiate the Rights Which the Defendants Claim From the Rights Which They Really Lawfully Have.

(3)b. Plaintiff's rights and defendants' rights under those facts.

(3)c. Are the acts of the defendants heretofore committed, which have injured plaintiff, and are the acts, which they design to do, and which will likewise injure plaintiff, justified?

In connection with their justification, we have also considered two propositions advanced by the defendants:

1. That the injunction granted imperils the existence of Labor Unions, and that no case of like kind can be found in any decision of any English, nor of any American Court.

2. That public policy recognizes the benefit of Labor Unions and, incidental to their existence and necessary to their growth, the right of organizers to organize.

Second. The Remedy.

1. Indictment for conspiracy at common law.
2. Action at law for damages.
3. Injunction.

From a careful study of all authorities available to us, which have come under our notice, we are convinced that plaintiff is entitled to the relief it now has; and we are equally sure that defendants have not, either in precedent, law, justice, or morals, the privilege they contend for.

This Court will not forget that plaintiff had these defendants for masters once, to plaintiff's loss; neither will this Court forget that defendants are trying to reassert their sway.

While in the toils of the Union, plaintiff was ridden as burdensomely and as constantly as was Sindbad, the Sailor, by "The Old Man of the Sea," who was ever with Sindbad, asleep and awake. One day "The Old Man of the Sea" got drunk and lost his hold on Sindbad. So did the defendants lose their hold on plaintiff, when, in the intoxication of an unbridled indulgence of an unlicensed power they shut down plaintiff's mine April 16, 1906. Defendants were warned in advance not to do as they did. They were told that plaintiff would never deal with them again. But in spite of that they persisted.

They thought they could resume their mastery over plaintiff when and as they pleased.

But it did not turn out so.

Plaintiff started up non-union June 12, 1906, and for more than eight years has been independent.

Finding their prey escaped, the Union interfered with plaintiff's men. Defendants sought to reunionize plaintiff's mine.

But plaintiff meanwhile checkmated defendants by contracting with its men that they would not join the Union while employed, and that while so employed plaintiff would run a non-union mine.

The plaintiff enjoined.

And this Court is now asked by these defendants to help them in their cause.

Will it do it?

Finally, we want to press home the point that this case is not one whereby the right of Labor Unions to exist is questioned or will be determined. The question is—May the United Mine Workers resort to tortious interference with plaintiff's contractual relations with plaintiff's employes, in order to increase the Union's membership, and in order to reassert the Union's sway over plaintiff's business? The elements of malice in fact, malice in law, and the conspiracy are all to be kept in mind and are to be read into their efforts.

The United Mine Workers are not a responsible body as an entity. They are unincorporated. But as indicating their strength it is to be remembered that they have a membership throughout the United States of more than four hundred thousand men.

They are a body militant. Even as the Crusaders sought to spread their Gospel of Light, primarily by the use of persuasion, argument and reason, and, failing in that, resorted to acts of oppression and wrong that good to the Infidels might come, and in pursuit of their object forced their will upon the unwilling victims, even to the point of death, so do the United Mine Workers in their scheme contemplate the imposition of their Rule upon employers of labor in the coal mining industry and upon free men of this country, who for a livelihood are engaged in mining coal. And this the United Mine Workers claim the right to do regardless of the fact that the employer refuses to recognize the Union, expressly contracts with its men that they shall not be members of and shall not join the Union, and further expressly contracts with its men, and for their protection against their being forced to become outlaws in the labor world, that the employer will continue to refuse to recognize the United Mine Workers and will run non-union.

Defendants may, like the Crusaders, be made bold by numbers. They may be fervid in their devotion, sustained as were the Crusaders by dreams of conquest. They have been made fat in pocketbook by the check-off, even as the Crusaders became rich from the spoils of battle.

But to the Crusaders there came a time when their excesses wrought their downfall. So with these defendants.

In all lands and in all climes man has dreamed of liberty. Man's life principle is instinct with a desire for freedom. What is true of the individual is true of the State. But environment and the past make varied our conceptions of what is liberty and of what is freedom. And the Constitution of the United States and its amendments, and the Constitution of West Virginia, are so framed that what is one man's liberty is not another man's slavery. There is an equality of right, and our Courts have so interpreted our Constitutions and our laws.

With these constitutionally guaranteed principles of liberty, freedom and equality, quaintly condensed by Lincoln into the aphorism "No man is good enough to govern another man without that other's consent" these defendant labor leaders, and the Union they represent, have interfered.

And they ask this Court to help them to continue to interfere.

Their contention is foreign to the spirit of our government, State and National. It is in the teeth of our best adjudged cases. And if now upheld by this Court, such holding must result in chaos for government and in a complete somersault for the law.

By their appeal to the Circuit Court of Appeals and by their contention before this Court, these defendants assert that they have the right to go ahead and by permission or by other means, not including, however, force, fraud, violence, intimidation, or coercion, unionize plaintiff's men, and consequently its mine.

And it is to be remembered that this alleged right was reasserted by the defendants during the trial. Lewis, then President of the United Mine Workers of America, testified (Record p. 630 l. 28–32), on direct examination, as did Sullivan, then President of District No. 6, United Mine Workers of America (Record, p. 743 l. 33–44, p. 744 l. 1, 2), on direct examination, as did Savage, then Secretary-Treasurer of District No. 6, United Mine Workers of America (Record, p. 590 l. 32–42, and p. 591 l. 1–29), on cross examination, that efforts to unionize the Hitchman mine would still be made if the injunction forbidding it were out of the way.

So the issue is clear cut.

The defendants assert that what they propose to do is certainly within their rights.

And the plaintiff denies it.

It is now for this Court to decide.

Study of the common law never taught us that contract rights created and existing within the law are not to be protected by the law.

Study of the common law never taught us that any set of men, trade unionists, or not, had or have any special privileges under law not accorded to other persons.

Study of the common law never taught us that any set of men, trade unionists, or not, may with impunity, and without liability under law, conspire to interfere with the will of other persons in the conduct of their business or work, lawfully undertaken, prosecuted and engaged in.

What these defendants contend for is not the law of the land.

It is one of the doctrines of modern militant unionism that membership is rightfully made compulsory through social or other pressure, and ought to be made compulsory by legal enactment, and that the right to work should be as much dependent upon membership in a trade union as does the right to vote depend upon citizenship in the State.

That, however, is not the law of this land, and under the Constitution of the United States, and under the Constitution of the State of West Virginia never can be law.

Trade unions may exist lawfully if their purposes are lawful; and they may carry out their lawful purposes if they do so in a lawful way.

That was and is the common law, and is the law of the State of West Virginia.

Trade unions may not exist for unlawful purposes, and the carrying out of unlawful purposes by acts otherwise lawful is unlawful.

That was and is the common law, and is the law of the State of West Virginia.

And if a trade union exists with some lawful, and some unlawful, purposes, the law determines what is the main purpose of the Union's existence, and upon that being determined, adjudges the Union to be a legal or an illegal body, according as its main purpose is within or is without the law.

That was and is the common law, and is the law of the State of West Virginia.

If a trade union, having both lawful and unlawful purposes, is adjudged to be an unlawful body, it has no right to exist; such lawful purposes, as it may have, become tainted with the unlawfulness of its main purpose, and it becomes, as an entire union, an outlaw to the law.

That was and is the common law, and is the law of the State of West Virginia.

It would be unlawful to solicit membership in an unlawful union.

In the bill which was filed in this case it was alleged that the United Mine Workers of America have some lawful and some unlawful purposes, that it was in carrying out their unlawful purposes that they violated plaintiff's rights, and they were alleged to be an unlawful body under the common law and under the law of West Virginia. And during the trial, as well as in the final briefs and oral arguments, counsel for plaintiff attacked the Union for unlawfulness, while counsel for the defendants combatted such efforts and sought to show the Union's lawfulness.

We believe this Court will find the evidence to bristle with proof that most of the purposes of the United Mine Workers of America are unlawful; and that from such evidence this Court will be driven to the conclusion that their main purpose is so unlawful as to taint with illegality every other purpose they may have.

We ask this Court to find that the United Mine Workers of America are an unlawful body.

With that decision will follow, as a matter of law, that that Union may not solicit membership.

In asking this Court to reverse the decree of the Circuit Court of Appeals and to affirm the decree of the District Court of January 18, 1913, and to perpetuate the injunction granted thereby, and to hold that the United Mine Workers of America are an unlawful body, that they have been and are engaged in a conspiracy against the plaintiff to compel it to operate a union mine contrary to plaintiff's will and against plaintiff's protest, and that in carrying out such conspiracy they have been and are violating plaintiff's contractual as well as common law rights, we invoke consideration of section 20 of Article III, Bill of Rights, Constitution of West Virginia.

> "Free government and the blessings of liberty can be preserved to any people only by a firm adherence to justice, moderation, temperance, frugality and virtue, and by a frequent recurrence to fundamental principles."

III.

The Decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit Violates Rights of the Hitchman Company which are Secured to it by the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

The Fifth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States contains this clause.

"Nor [shall any person] be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law."

9 F. S. A., p. 288.

"A similar clause, as an inhibition on the states, is contained in the Fourteenth Amendment."

Note 1, 9 F. S. A., p. 288.

On page 289 of 9 F. S. A., it is said of the foregoing language of Amendment Five:

"This Amendment only announces and reaffirms the ancient principles of the common law, and prevents them from being unjustly invaded by the power of the federal government."

North Carolina v. Vanderford, (1888) 35 Fed. Rep. 282.

On page 290, 9 F. S. A., it is said that this provision of the Fifth Amendment has application to corporations as well as to natural persons.

"VI. Application to Corporations.—From the nature of the prohibitions in this amendment it would seem, with the exception of the last clause, as though they would only apply to natural persons. No others can be witnesses; no others can be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb, or compelled to be witnesses against themselves; and therefore it might be said with much force that the word "person," there used in connection with the prohibition against the deprivation of life, liberty, and property without due process of law, is in like manner limited to a natural person. But such has not been the construction of the courts. A similar provision is found in nearly all of the state constitutions; and everywhere, and at all times, and in all courts, it has been held, either by tacit assent or express adjudication, to extend, so far as their property is concerned, to corporations. And this has been because the property of a corporation is in fact the property of the corporators. To deprive the corporation of its property, or to burden it, is, in fact, to deprive the corporators of their property or to lessen its value."

> "This amendment contains a prohibition upon the Government of the United States, similar to the one in the Fourteenth Amendment against the action of the States, declaring that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; and it has been assumed, if not expressly held, that the provision protects the property of corporations against confiscation equally with that of individuals. San Mateo County v. Southern Pac. R. Co. (1882), 13 Fed. Rep., 151."

> 9 F. S. A., 290, VI.

In considering how far the rights of the Hitchman Company can be said to be affected and to be protected by the Constitutional provision above quoted, the following language taken from 9 F. S. A., page 303, and the case cited there as authority for the proposition, there advanced, tend to show that it is correct to claim on behalf of the Hitchman Company that the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit professing to state and to apply the common law of West Virginia upon the subject of contract [but really misapplying West Virginia law, as that law is declared to be by the Supreme Court of Appeals of that State in the case of Thacker Coal & Coke Company v. Burke (1906), 59 W. Va. 253; 53 S. E. 161; 8 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 885], violates the rights of the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company as guaranteed to it by the above quoted language of the Fifth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

> "14. Giving Unwarranted Effect to Decision of State Court.—A judgment of the Circuit Court of the United States claiming to give such unwarranted effect to a decision of a state court as to wrongfully deprive a party of his property, may be considered as presenting a question how far it can be sustained in view of the prohibitory langauge of this clause."
> Fayerweather v. Ritch (1904), 195 U. S. 208.

A later discussion of the doctrine announced in Fayerweather v. Ritch will be found in the case of Hannah O'Callaghan, et al. v. Terence O'Brien, admr., etc., et als. (1905), 199 U. S. 89, 50 L. ed. 101, 25 S. C. 727. (Officially reported under the title of "Farrell v. O'Brien.")

The case of Hovey against Elliott, decided by the Supreme Court of the United States (1897), 167 U. S. 409 42 L. ed. 215, disposes of the question as to whether the decision of the Federal Court can be said to violate rights of a citizen guaranteed to him by the foregoing provision of Amendment Five to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. Justice White delivering the opinion of the Court in speaking on that particular point says:

> "If the legislative department of the Government were to enact a statute conferring the right to condemn the citizen without any opportunity whatever > of being heard, would it be pretended that such an enactment would not be violative of the Constitution? If this be true, as it undoubtedly is, how can it be said that the judicial department, the source and fountain of justice itself, has yet the authority to render lawful that which if done under express legislative sanction would be violative of the Constitution. If such power obtains, then the judicial department of the government sitting to uphold and enforce the Constitution is the only one possessing a power to disregard it. If such authority exists then in consequence of their establishment, to compel obedience to law and to enforce justice, courts possess the right to inflict the very wrongs which they were created to prevent."

> Hovey v. Elliott. (Decided May 24, 1897.) 167 U. S. 409, 417. 42 L. Ed. 215, 221.

It seems clear, therefore, that the quoted portion of Amendment Five restrains the judicial as well as the executive branches of the Federal Government, and, therefore, the rights of the Hitchman Company may fairly be said to have been violated by the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit.

It remains, however, to be considered whether the right violated is one of sufficient merit to justify the Supreme Court in granting or considering an appeal from the Circuit Court of Appeals either through an appeal proper or through an application for a writ of certiorari.

The right to do business and liberty of contract are involved in this case, and both of those rights are believed to have been violated by the decision of the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals.

And that these rights are regarded as important rights is evidenced by the fact that they are guaranteed to citizens, not only by the Constitution of the United States as shown by the provisions of Amedment Five and Amendment Fourteen to the Constitution of the United States, but by the fact that they are also guaranteed to citizens by the Constitution of the State of West Virginia.

Bill of Rights, §1. Art. III., Constitution of West Virginia:

"All men are, by nature, equally free and independent, and have certain inherent rights, of which, when they enter into a state of society, they cannot, by any compact, deprive or divest their posterity, namely: the enjoyment of life and liberty, with the means of acquiring and possessing property, and of pursuing and obtaining happiness and safety."

Bill of Rights, §10, Art. III., Constitution of West Virginia:

"No person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or the judgment of his peers."

In State v. Goodwill (1889), 33 W. Va., 179; 10 S. E., 285, 287; 6 L. R. A., 621; 25 Am. St. Rep., 863, it is said:

> "A person living under the protection of this government has the right to adopt and follow any lawful industrial pursuit, not injurious to the community, which he may see fit. And, as incident to this, is the right to labor or employ labor; make contracts in respect thereto, upon such terms as may be agreed upon by the parties; to enforce all lawful contracts; to sue, and give evidence; and to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, and convey property of every kind. The enjoyment or deprivation of these rights and privileges constitutes the essential distinction between freedom and slavery; between liberty and oppression."

and again—

> "The vocation of an employer, as well as that of his employe, is his property. Depriving the owner of property of one of its attributes is depriving him of his property, under the provisions of the constitution. People v. Otis, 90 N. Y. 48. The right to use, buy, and sell property, and contract in respect thereto, including contracts for labor—which is, as we have seen, property—is protected by the constitution. If the legislature without any public necessity, has the power to prohibit or restrict the right of contract between private persons in respect to one lawful trade or business, then it may prevent the prosecution of all trades, and regulate all contracts."

and in the same case—

> "The rights of every individual must stand or fall by the same rule of law that governs every other member of the body politic under similar circumstances; and every partial or private law which directly proposes to destroy or affect individual rights, or does the same thing by restricting the privileges of certain classes of citizens and not of others, when there is no public necessity for such discrimination, is unconstitutional and void."
> State v. Goodwill, 32 W. Va. 179, supra.

These principles underlie the Declaration of Independence, and naturally and logically are embraced in our scheme of government, National and State.

And the decisions of the Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia interpreting the Bill of Rights of the Constitution of that State have their parallel in decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States upon the meaning and scope of the guaranties of the Federal Constitution as expressed in the Fifth and in the Fourteenth Amendments thereto.

Upon parallel provisions of the Constitution of the United States, Mr. Justice Field concurring with the opinion of the Court, which was delivered by Mr. Justice Miller, in Butchers' Union, etc., Co. v. Crescent City, etc., Co. (1884), 111 U. S. 746; 28 L. Ed. 585, 591; 4 S. C. 652, said:

> "As in our intercourse with our fellow-men certain principles of morality are assumed to exist, without which society would be impossible, so certain inherent rights lie at the foundation of all governmental action, and upon a recognition of them alone can free institutions be maintained. These inherent rights have never been more happily expressed than in the Declaration of Independence, that new evangel of liberty to the people: 'We hold these truths to be self-evident,' that is, so plain that their truth is recognized upon their mere statement, 'that all men are endowed;' not by edicts of Emperors or decrees of Parliament or Acts of Congress, but 'by their Creator, with certain inalienable rights' that is, rights which cannot be bartered away or given away or taken away except in punishment of crime; 'and that among these are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness, and to secure these,' not grant them but secure them, 'governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed.'
> "Among these inalienable rights, as proclaimed in that great document, is the right of men to pursue their happiness, by which is meant the right to pursue any lawful business or vocation, in any manner not inconsistent with the equal rights of others, which may increase their prosperity or develop their faculties, so as to give to them their highest enjoyment.
> "The common business and callings of life, the ordinary trades and pursuits, which are innocuous in themselves and have been followed in all communities from time immemorial, must, therefore, be free in this country to all alike upon the same conditions. The right to pursue them, without let or hindrance, except > that which is applied to all persons of the same age, sex and condition, is a distinguishing privilege of citizens of the United States, and an essential element of that freedom which they claim as their birthright."

In the same case, Mr. Justice Bradley, concurring, with whom concurred Mr. Justice Harlan and Mr. Justice Woods (111 U. S. 762; 28 L. ed. 589), said:

> "The right to follow any of the common occupations of life is an inalienable right; it was formulated as such under the phrase 'pursuit of happiness' in the Delcaration of Independence, which commenced with the fundamental proposition that 'All men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness.' This right is a large ingredient in the civil liberty of the citizen. To deny it to all but a few favored individuals, by investing the latter with a monopoly, is to invade one of the fundamental privileges of the citizen, contrary not only to common right, but, as I think, to the express words of the Constitution. It is what no Legislature has a right to do."

In Allgeyer et al. v. State of Louisiana (1897), 165 U. S. 578, 589; 41 L. ed. 832, 835; 17 S. C. 427, Mr. Justice Peckham delivering the opinion of the Court said of the meaning of the word "liberty"—

> "The term is deemed to embrace the right of the citizen to be free in the enjoyment of all his faculties; to be free to use them in all lawful ways; to live and work where he will; to earn his livelihood by any lawful calling; to pursue any livelihood or avocation, and for that purpose to enter into all contracts which may be proper, necessary, and essential to his carrying out to a successful conclusion the purposes above mentioned."

In Lochner v. People of the State of New York (1905), 198 U. S. 45, 56; 49 L. ed. 937, 940, 941; 25 S. C. 539, Mr. Justice Peckham delivering the opinion of the Court said:

> "The general right to make a contract in relation to his business is part of the liberty of the individual protected by the 14th Amendment of the Federal Constitution."

And again said:

> "Of course the liberty of contract relating to labor includes both parties to it. The one has as much right to purchase as the other to sell labor."

In the case of Adair v. United States (1907), 208 U. S. 161, 52 L. ed. 436, the Supreme Court indicated that it regarded the controversy in that case as a meritorious one. And Mr. Justice Harlan delivering the opinion of the court said:

> "May Congress make it a criminal offense against the United States—as, by the 10th section of the act of 1898, it does—for an agent or officer of an interstate carrier, having full authority in the premises from the carrier, to discharge an employe from service simply because of his membership in a labor organization?
> "This question is admittedly one of importance, and has been examined with care and deliberation. And the court has reached a conclusion which, in its judgment, is consistent with both the words and spirit of the Constitution, and is sustained as well by sound reason."
> 52 L. Ed. 441.

And he added:

> "The first inquiry is whether the part of the 10th section of the act of 1898 upon which the first count of the indictment was based is repugnant to the Fifth Amendment of the Constitution, declaring that no person shall be deprived of liberty or property without due process of law. In our opinion that section, in the particular mentioned, is an invasion of the personal liberty, as well as of the right of property, guaranteed by that Amendment. Such liberty and right embrace the right to make contracts for the purchase of the labor of others, and equally the right to make contracts for the sale of one's own labor; each right, however, being subject to the fundamental condition that no contract, whatever its subject-matter, can be sustained which the law, upon reasonable grounds, forbids as inconsistent with the public interests, or as hurtful to the public order, or as detrimental to the common good. This court has said that "in every well-ordered society, charged with the duty of conserving the safety of its members, the rights of the individual in respect of his liberty may, at times, under the pressure of great dangers, be subjected to such restraint, to be enforced by reasonable regulations, as the safety of the general public may demand."

Jacobson v. Massachusetts, 197 U. S. 11, 29, 49 L. ed. 643, 651, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 358, 362, and authorities there cited.

Without stopping to consider what would have been the rights of the railroad company under the Fifth Amendment, had it been indicted under the Act of Congress, it is sufficient in this case to say that, as agent of the railroad company, and, as such, responsible for the conduct of the business of one of its departments, it was the defendant Adair's right—and that right inhered in his personal liberty, and was also a right of property—to serve his employer as best he could, so long as he did nothing that was reasonably forbidden by law as injurious to the public interests. It was the right of the defendant to prescribe the terms upon which the services of Coppage would be accepted, and it was the right of Coppage to become or not, as he chose, an employe of the railroad company upon the terms offered to him. Mr. Cooley, in his treatise on Torts, p. 278, well says:

> "It is a part of every man's civil rights that he be left at liberty to refuse business relations with any person whomsoever, whether the refusal rest upon reason, or is the result of whim, caprice, prejudice, or malice. With his reasons neither the public nor third persons have any legal concern. It is also his right to have business relations with anyone with whom he can make contracts, and, if he is wrongfully deprived of this right by others, he is entitled to redress."

It will be seen from the foregoing that the constitutional provisions of the Federal Constitution and the provisions of the Constitution of the State of West Virginia are in substance the same, and it will also be seen that the interpretation placed upon the provisions of the Constitution of the United States by the Supreme Court of the United States and the interpretation placed upon the Constitution of the State of West Virginia by the Supreme Court of Appeals of that State are parallel if not identical.

While, however, it is plain enough that the Circuit Court of Appeals should have followed the general principles laid down by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States referred to in interpreting rights of the plaintiff which are shown to be rights guaranteed to it by the Constitution of the United States and the amendments thereto, it does not yet appear what the obligation of the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit was with respect to rights guaranteed to the Hitchman Company by the Constitution of the State of West Virginia.

This last subject is covered by the case of Loeb v. Trustees of Columbia Township (1900), 179 U. S. 472, 45 L. ed. 280, holding that Federal courts in determining contract rights as affected by a state Constitution will enforce the contract in accordance with the Constitution of the State, as interpreted at the time the contract was made by the highest court of the State.

In deciding that case, Mr. Justice Harlan said:

> "As, however, the circuit courts of the United States are courts of 'an independent jurisdiction in the administration of state laws co-ordinate with, and not sub-ordinate to, that of the State courts, and are bound to exercise their own judgment as to the meaning and effect of those laws' (Burgess v. Seligman, 107 U. S. 20, 33, 34, 27 L. ed. 359, 365, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 10; Folsom v. Township Ninety-six, 159 U. S. 611, 624, 625, 40 L. ed. 278, 283, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 174), they may, in suits within their jurisdiction, properly hold, as in numerous cases this court has held, that the rights of parties arising under contracts not involving questions of a Federal nature are to be determined in accordance with the settled principles of local law as maintained by the highest court of the state at the time such rights accrued."
> 45 L. ed. 291.

The real controversy between the Hitchman Company, on the one side, and the defendants, on the other side, arises out of an effort on the part of the defendants, representing the United Mine Workers of America, to induce the Hitchman Company's employes to become members of their Union, and thus to enable the United Mine Workers of America to compel the Hitchman Company to operate what is called a union mine, that is, to operate a mine by making a contract with the United Mine Workers of America, and on the part of the Hitchman Company the controversy is due to the effort of the Hitchman Company to keep from having its employes join that Union and to keep from being obliged to run a union mine and to have to contract with these defendants as representatives of the United Mine Workers of America.

In its effort to keep in position to be able to run a non-union mine, the Hitchman Company contracts with each of its employes along certain lines, and the net result is embodied in the following memorandum card:

> "I am employed by and work for the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company with the express understanding that I am not a member of the United Mine Workers of America and will not become so while an employe of the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company, and that the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company is run non-union and agrees with me that it will run non-union while I am in its employ. If at any time while I am employed by the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company I want to become connected with the United Mine Workers of Amercia, or any affiliated organization, I agree to withdraw from the employment of said company, and agree that while I am in the employ of that company I will not make any effort amongst its employes to bring about the unionizing of that mine against the company's wish. I have either read the above, or heard same read."
> Hitchman Coal & Coke Co. v. Mitchell, 202 Fed. 512, 553.

The District Court of the United States for the Northern District of West Virginia held that this was a lawful contract.

> "An employer and its employes may lawfully contract with respect to the terms of the employment, and as incidental thereto that the employes shall not join a labor union and the employer shall not employ union men; and, when such a contract has been made, a combination between officers or members of the labor union to induce either party to violate the contract, with which they have no rightful concern, constitutes an unlawful conspiracy, to restrain the carrying out of which the other party is entitled to an injunction."

Hitchman Coal & Coke Co. v. Mitchell et al. (Circuit Court, N. D. West Virginia. September 21, 1909.) 172 Fed. 963, Syl. 2.

The defendants upon appeal to the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit against the foregoing decision, as to the legitimacy of such a contract, set up in their assignment of errors the following: The District Court erred—

"In holding that the defendants had not the lawful right to use argument, reason and persuasion to solicit, invite or peaceably induce the plaintiff's employes to become members of the United Mine Workers of America; or to use any lawful means to have the employes of the plaintiff become members of the said labor organization." Record p. 844.

"In finding and holding that the defendants were attempting to interfere with the contracts existing between the plaintiff and its employes, and attempting to induce said employes to break said contracts." Record p. 844.

"In holding that the plaintiff had entered into lawful contracts with its employes—contracts not in contravention of public policy—and that the plaintiff is entitled to be protected by a court of equity in the enforcement of its said contracts." Record p. 845.

"In declining to hold and adjudicate that the various contracts entered into between the plaintiff in this suit and its employes, was contrary to law, and against public policy, and illegal and void." Record p. 845.

The Circuit Court of Appeals, in considering this contract, did not reach the conclusion that the contract was unlawful, but did hold that an outsider, a stranger to the contract, could by peaceable means induce a breach thereof by one of the parties thereto. That Court said:

> "The Court below also reached the conclusion that the defendants have caused and are attempting to cause the non-union members employed by the plaintiff to break a contract which it has with the non-union operators. The contract in question is in the following language:
>
> "I am employed by and work for the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company with the express understanding that I am not a member of the United Mine Workers of America, and will not become so while an employe of the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company; that the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company is run non-union and agrees with me that it will run non-union while I am in its employ. If at any time while I am employed by the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company I want to become connected with the United Mine Workers of America, or any affiliated organization, I agree to withdraw from the employment of said company, and agree that while I am in the employ of that company that I will not make any efforts amongst its employes to bring about the unionizing of that mine against the company's wish. I have either read the above or heard the same read.'"
> "It will be observed that by the terms of the contract that either of the parties thereto may at will terminate the same, and while it is provided that so long as the employe continues to work for the plaintiff he shall not join this organization, nevertheless, there is nothing in the contract which requires such employes to work for any fixed or definite period. If at any time after employment any of them should decide to join the defendant organization, the plaintiff could not under the contract recover damages for a breach of the same. In other words, the employes under this contract may, if they deem proper, at any moment join a labor union, and the only penalty provided therefor is that they cannot secure further employment from the plaintiff. Therefore, under this contract, if the non-union men, or any of them, should see fit to join the United Mine Workers of America on account of lawful and persuasive methods on the part of the defendants, and as a result of such action on their part were to be discharged by the plaintiff, it could not maintain an action against them on account of such conduct on their part. Such being the case it would be unreasonable to hold that the action of the defendants would render the United Mine Workers of America liable in damages to the plaintiff because they had employed lawful methods to induce the non-union miners to become members of their organization.

"Under these circumstances we fail to see how this contract can be taken as a basis for restraining the defendants from using lawful methods for the purpose of inducing the parties to the contract to join the organization." Record pp. 892, 893.

It will be noticed that the conclusion reached by the Circuit Court of Appeals is based upon the proposition that it is lawful by peaceable means to persuade an employe at will to quit work.

And yet the Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia in the case of Thacker Coal & Coke Company v. Burke (1906), 59 W. Va. 253, 53 S. E. 161, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1091, 6 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 885, held:

"One who maliciously entices a servant in actual service of a master to desert and quit his service is liable to action therefor."

"If one wantonly and maliciously, whether for his own benefit or not, induces a person to violate his contract with a third person, to the injury of that third person, it is actionable."

"Persons who conspire to induce others to break a valid contract between other persons are liable to action therefor."

"The act found in Code, 1899, § 14, appendix, p. 1053, does not authorize any individual, or number of individuals, to maliciously entice servants to desert service in which they are engaged, or to prevent them from engaging in such service under a contract for such service."

Id., 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1091, 1092. Syl. 1, 2, 3, 4.

Judge Brannon, in delivering the opinion of the Court in the Thacker case, said:

"The Thacker Coal & Coke Company filed a declaration in trespass on the case in the Circuit Court of Mingo County against Charles Burke and five others for damages for enticing servants from the plaintiff's service, which declaration upon demurrer was dismissed, and the company sued out a writ of error.

"Certain legal principles control the case. In West Virginia Transp. Co. v. Standard Oil Co., 50 W. Va. 611, 56 L. R. A. 804, 88 Am. St. Rep. 895, 40 S. E. 591, we find it stated, on authority there given, that 'if one wantonly and maliciously, whether for his own benefit or not, induce a person to violate his contract with a third person to the injury of that third person, it is actionable.' We find that holding confirmed in Angle v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co., 151 U. S. 1, 38 L. ed. 55, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 240, in the language following: 'If one maliciously interferes in a contract between two parties, and induces one of them to break that contract, to the injury of the other, the party injured can maintain an action against the wrongdoer. When a man does an act which in law and fact is a wrongful act, and injury to another results from it as a natural and probable consequence, an action on the case will lie.' If additional authority were needed for such a proposition of common sense and justice, see the case decided by the highest English tribunal in 1901, Quinn v. Leathem (1901), A. C. 495. What I have already said refers to contracts in general. As to the particular contract between master and servant, the law is, if possible, yet more decided. The common law says that one who causes a breach of that contract is liable to damages. It has been said by some that action in such case lies only by reason of the act of Parliament in the reign of Edward III, A. D. 1350, making the act of enticement of a servant from his employer wrongful. If so, we might hesitate in saying that it is actionable in West Virginia; but I assert, believing that I am supported by ample authority, that action is given in such case by the common law. So the text writers and courts treat it. In Comyns's Digest, title 'Action on the Case,' A, p. 278, the common law rule is thus stated: 'In all cases where a man has a temporal loss or damage by the wrong of another, he may have an action upon the case to be repaired in damages.' The Supreme Court of the United States, in Angle v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. supra, stated the rule thus: 'Wherever a man does an act which in law and in fact is a wrongful act, and such an act as may, as a natural and probable consequence of it, produce injury to another, and which in the particular case does produce such an injury, an action on the case will lie.' It is generally treated as a common-law cause of action. The general principle applicable to contracts in general would give action against a third party for wrongfully causing the breach of contract between master and servant; but as to this particular contract the law has been long settled:

from. But in this action it is necessary to prove not only that the person employed was in the service of the plaintiff, but also that the defendant, knowing the fact, wrongfully induced him to leave it. The intent of the defendant, and the natural or actual effect of its execution, is the gist of the action; and, unless the declaration discloses that the act was done intentionally or wilfully, and that it actually did, or was calculated to, cause damage to the plaintiff, and that it was done without right or justifiable cause, no recovery can be had. Malice is inferred from the wrongful character of the act, and the declaration or complaint must disclose such facts as support the inference. If a contract to serve is established, actual service under the contract need not be shown. It is enough to show that the defendant, with notice of the servant's contract obligation to the plaintiff, has persuaded him not to enter into the plaintiff's service under it.' Wood, Mast. & S. §§ 230, 231. 'The idea of interference with contract relations as a specific tort is of recent origin. The materials from which the generalization was worked out are found in several lines of precedents. From an early day it has been established that a master may maintain an action against one who entices away his servant or harbors and detains him with knowledge of his former contract.' 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 1109. 'Certainly since the statute of laborers the common law has recognized the right of a master to recover for the actual damage he may have suffered by the wrongful interference by a third person with his relationship to his servant by personal injury to the servant, or otherwise depriving the master, in whole or in part, of his service. * * * Actions for enticing servants from their employer, and for knowingly harboring servants who had previously left their employer, arose after the first statute of laborers. They survive its repeal, and occur in modern practice. Knowingly enticing from the service of another one who is employed under a contract not fully executed is an actionable wrong.

Indeed, from this basis there has grown up a branch of law in which malice is an essential ingredient.' Jaggard, Torts, § 155. 'To the relation between master and servant, and the rights accruing therefrom, there are two species of injuries incident. The one is retaining a man's hired servant before his time is expired; the other is beating or confining him in such a manner that he is not able to perform his work. As to the first, the retaining another person's servant during the time he has agreed to serve his present master. This, as it is an ungentlemanlike, so it is also an illegal, act; for every master has by his contract purchased for a valuable consideration the service of his domestics for a limited time. The inveigling or hiring his servant, which induces a breach of this contract, is therefore an injury to the master, and for that injury the law has given him a remedy by a special action on the case; and he may also have an action against the servant for the nonperformance of his agreement. But, if the new master was not apprised of the former contract, no action lies against him unless he refuses to restore the servant upon demand.' Bl. Com. bk. 2, 142.

"I deem it useless to occupy space by quotation from other text-books and decisions to prove the doctrine above stated. They all lay down the law to the same effect. 2 Kinkead, Torts, § 457; 3 Page, Contr. §§ 1326, 1327; 11 Am. St. Rep. 378, 474, notes; Schouler, Dom. Rel. § 487; Moran v. Dunphy, 177 Mass. 485, 52 L. R. A. 115, 83 Am. St. Rep. 289, 59 N. E. 125; Bowen v. Hall, L. R. 6 Q. B. Div. 333; Walker v. Cronin, 107 Mass. 555; Quinn v. Leathem (1901), A. C. 495; Taff Vale R. Co. v. Amalgamated Soc. (1901), A. C. 426. Hammon on Contracts, § 350, says: 'The duty to respect the contractual tie so far as not to interfere with it rests upon all the world. Thus it is everywhere agreed that it is an actionable wrong to entice away a man's servant from his employment. Independently of any right to sue the servant for breach of the contract of employment, the master may hold the guilty person liable in damages for thus wrongfully inducing the servant to sever the relation. Many courts, indeed go further, and lay down the broad principle that a man who justifiably induces one of two parties to a contract to break it, intending thereby to injure the other or to obtain a benefit for himself, does that other a wrong, for which he must respond in damages.'

"The first count of the declaration alleges that the company is owner and operator of a coal mine, and was engaged on the 8th day of August, 1901, in the business of mining coal from the mine; that, in order to carry on the business, it was necessary for the plaintiff to employ, and it did employ, a large number of men to work in the mine, who were engaged in the company's service in working the mine and loading coal on railroad cars for shipment to parties with whom the plaintiff had contracts to furnish coal; that the defendants, well knowing these facts, but contriving and wickedly and maliciously intending to injure the plaintiff in its business, unlawfully, wrongfully, maliciously, without justifiable cause, without the consent and against the will of the plaintiff, molested, obstructed, and hindered the plaintiff in its said business 'by wilfully, wrongfully, and maliciously persuading, inducing, enticing, and procuring said servants of the plaintiff, employed as aforesaid, to absent themselves and depart from the plaintiff's service;' that on pretext, and by reason of such persuasion, enticement, and procuration, the said servants on the date aforesaid, without license and against the will and consent of the plaintiff, wrongfully absented themselves and departed from said service, and continued to do so; that the plaintiff was unable to employ other servants to work in its mine in the place of the servants so enticed away, and was thereby prevented from prosecuting and carrying on its business as extensively and profitably as it could and would have done had not its servants been induced and enticed by the defendants to quit its service. The first count does not, in words, state an express contract for service between employer and employe.

> By the language used in the books a contract must exist. This count says the miners were 'employed' by the plaintiff and in actual service. Now, if the law gives action for enticement of a servant, it is not conceivable that a third person can maliciously entice away a lot of employes simply because there was no contract fixing term of service. The relation of master and servant exists. In such case there is a contract recognized by law, an implied contract by which the employe can recover for his service. By entering such service the employe agrees, contracts, to work. IT IS NO DIFFERENCE THAT HE CAN QUIT WHEN HE PLEASES."
> Id., 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1094-1101.

The Circuit Court of Appeals in not having held the contract unlawful must be considered as having held the contract to be lawful.

The question then arises what would be a breach of the contract by the employe. It would not be a breach of a contract by the employe for the employe to quit service, because under the express terms of the contract that right is expressly reserved to him. It would, however, be a breach of his contract for the employe to join the Union while in the employ of the Hitchman Company. And such action could be enjoined following the precedent laid down in the case of Lumley v. Wagner which was a companion case of the celebrated case of Lumley v. Gye.

The common law on this subject is well laid down in 20 Halsbury's Laws of England, page 114.

"Where, however, the contract of service includes a negative stipulation by which the master or the servant binds himself not to do a specific act, the court, while declining to enforce specific performance of the contract as a whole, will enforce the negative stipulation, and will restrain the master or servant by injunction from committing a breach thereof. The negative stipulation must, however, be expressed on the face of the contract, or at least be clearly implied from its language;"

20 H. L. E. 114.

In the case of Lumley v. Wagner, Wagner had agreed with Lumley to sing at his theatre during a certain period of time, and not to sing elsewhere without his written authority, it was held on a bill filed to restrain her from singing for a third party, and to grant an injunction for that purpose, that the positive and negative stipulations of the agreement formed but one contract, and the court would interfere to prevent the violation of the negative stipulation, although it could not enforce the specific performance of the entire contract. Lumley v. Wagner, 1 De G. M. & G. 604; 21 L. J., Ch. 898.

The case of Lumley v. Gye is one of those cited and relied upon by the Supreme Court of the United States in deciding the case of Angle v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. (1894), 151 U. S. 1, 38 L. ed. 55, 14 S. C. 240.

In the Angle case, above referred to, the Supreme Court of the United States decided as follows:

> "If one maliciously interferes in a contract between two parties, and induces one of them to break that contract to the injury of the other, the party injured can maintain an action against the wrongdoer."
> Id., 38 L. ed. 55, Syl. 2.

Mr. Justice Brewer, in delivering the opinion of the Court in that case, said:

> "It has been repeatedly held that, if one maliciously interferes in a contract between two parties, and induces one of them to break that contract to the injury of the other, the party injured can maintain an action against the wrongdoer. Green v. Button, 2 Cromp. M. & R. 707, in which the defendant, by falsely pretending to one party to a contract that he had a lien upon certain property, prevented such party from delivering it to the plaintiff, the other party to the contract, and was held responsible for the loss occasioned thereby. Lumley v. Gye, 2 El. & Bl. 216, in which a singer had entered into a contract to sing only at the theatre of the plaintiff, and the defendant maliciously induced her to break that contract, and was held liable to the damages sustained by the plaintiff in consequence thereof. Bowen v. Hall, L. R. 6 Q. B. Div. 333, in which it was held that an action lies against a third person who maliciously induces another to break his contract of exclusive personal service with an employer, which thereby would naturally cause, and did in fact cause, an injury to such employer. In the opinion of Brett, L. J., it was said 'that wherever a man does an act which in law and in fact is a wrongful act, and such an act as may, as a natural and probable consequence of it, produce injury to another, and which in the particular case does produce such an injury, an action on the case will lie. This is the proposition to be deduced from the case of Ashby v. White, 1 Ld. Raym. 938. If these conditions are satisfied, the action does not the less lie because the natural and probable consequence of the act complained of is an act done by a third person; or because such act so done by the third person is a breach of duty or contract by him, or an act illegal on his part, or an act otherwise imposing an actionable liability on him.' Walker v. Cronin, 107 Mass. 555, in which a manufacturer was held entitled to maintain an action against a third party who, with the unlawful purpose of preventing him from carrying on his business, wilfully induced many of his employes to leave his employment, whereby the manufacturer lost their services, and the profits and advantages which he would have derived therefrom. Benton v. Pratt, 2 Wend. 385, 20 Am. Dec. 623. Rice v. Manley, 66 N. Y. 82, 23 Am. Rep. 30, in which a party had contracted to sell and deliver to plaintiffs a quantity of > cheese, but having been made to believe through the fraud of the defendant that the plaintiffs did not want the cheese, sold and delivered it to him, and it was held that an action could be maintained against the defendant for the damages which the plaintiffs sustained from failing to get the cheese. Jones v. Stanly, 76 N. C. 355, in which the court said: 'It was decided in Haskins v. Royster, 70 N. C. 601, 16 Am. Rep. 780, that if a person maliciously entices laborers or croppers to break their contracts with their employer and desert his service, the employer may recover damages against such person. The same reasons cover every case where one person maliciously persuades another to break any contract with a third person. It is not confined to contracts for service.' "

The doctrine laid down in the Angle case in 1894 was reaffirmed in 1907 in the Bitterman case.

In the Bitterman case, Mr. Justice White, delivering the opinion of the court, said that in the Angle case it was held by the Supreme Court that an actionable wrong is committed by one who maliciously interferes in a contract between two parties and induces one of them to break that contract to the injury of the other.

And Mr. Justice White added:

> "We deem it unnecessary to restate the grounds upon which the ruling in the Angle case was rested, or to trace the evolution of the principle in that case announced, because of the consideration given to the subject in the Angle case and the full reference to the authorities which was made in the opinion in that case."
> Bitterman v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (1907), 207 U. S. 205, 222, 223, 52 L. ed. 171, loc. cit. 182.

Paraphrasing the holding in the case of Lumley v. Wagner, supra, it is correct to say that the contract between the Hitchman Company and its employes is entire; that there is a positive stipulation on the part of the Hitchman Company that while the employe remains in the Company's employ the Company will run its mine non-union, and there is a negative covenant on the part of the employe that such employe will not join the United Mine Workers of America while he remains in the Company's employ.

Following Lumley v. Wagner the Court could not compel the Company to run non-union, although it could restrain it from running union, at the instance of the objecting non-union employe; and likewise could not compel the employe to work as a non-union man, although it could restrain him from working as a union man while in the Company's employ.

It is not to the point to say that the law does not notice little things and that the Company could discharge its employe if the employe broke his contract and it did not want him to remain in its employ after he had joined the union; neither is it in point to say that the employe if non-union could quit his job if he was not satisfied to continue working for the company if it broke its contract with him and ran union.

In the Bitterman case the breaching of so small a thing as the conditions of a railroad excursion ticket was the minimum issue, although the continuation of such breachings constituted the practical damage and the real cause of suit.

So in the Hitchman case the breaching of the contractual relations with one employe is the minimum issue, but the continuation of such breachings with other employes constitutes the practical damage, and is the substantial wrong to prevent which the Hitchman Company asked for and obtained the injunction from the District Court which it now asks to have upheld and perpetuated by this Court.

THE DECISION OF THE CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE FOURTH CIRCUIT VIOLATES RIGHTS OF THE HITCHMAN COMPANY WHICH ARE SECURED TO IT BY THE FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES.

The Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States contains this clause:

"Nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law."

9 F. S. A. p. 416.

"A similar clause, as an inhibition on the national government, is contained in the Fifth Amendment."

Note 1, 9 F. S. A. 416.

This amendment applies to corporations as well as to natural persons and restrains the judicial as well as the legislative branches of the state government.

If the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit correctly states and applies the law of West Virginia, then the rights of the Hitchman Company under the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States have been violated by that decision. Conversely, if the law of West Virginia has not been correctly stated and applied by the Circuit Court of Appeals, then the rights of the Hitchman Company under the Fifth Amendment of the Constitution have been violated by that decision.

FUNDAMENTAL RIGHT TO FREEDOM OF CONTRACT.

Aside from the provisions of the Fifth Amendment and aside from the provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, there is under the Federal Constitution, as well as under the Constitution of the State of West Virginia, a constitutional right to freedom of contract derived from either of two sources, namely, the right of freedom to labor or the right to acquire property; neither right being of value unless one can make contracts concerning it.

Stimson's Federal and State Constitutions of the United States, chap. III, Book I, pp. 18 to 35, both inclusive.

PUBLIC POLICY.

The decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals, so far as the Hitchman Company's rights relating to freedom of contract are concerned, does not follow but violates all precedents.

The court cites no authority in the form of any adjudged case, because there is no case.

In denying to the Hitchman Company the enjoyment of its inherent and constitutional rights with respect to freedom of contract, the Circuit Court of Appeals has relied upon what it assumes and states to be public policy.

In deciding the case, the court says:

> "This is an age of co-operation through organization. In fact organization is the only means by which united effort can be secured in any branch of human endeavor. The doctors, dentists, school teachers, wholesale and retail merchants, bankers and manufacturers, and in fact every branch of industry in this country, are organized for the purpose of the mutual protection of the respective parties interested. Such being the case, it is just as essential, and perhaps more important, that the laboring people should organize for their advancement and protection, than it is for any of the vocations we have mentioned.

remembered that the public is likewise interested, and in some instances affected to a greater extent than either labor or capital on account of the disputes and law suits growing out of these matters. Therefore, it may be properly said that these questions have a bearing upon the welfare of a large percentage of our people, and this is especially true as respects the coal industry. For instance, the suspension of the operation of coal mining in this country would in all probability result in a coal famine, which would, in a large measure, embarrass the manufacturers, to say nothing of the effect it would have upon the individual consumer, and all reasonable means should be employed to avert such a disaster. Therefore, we deem it our duty to define the rights of the parties to this controversy, in so far as we may under the facts of this case, so as to set at rest as many as possible of the vexatious questions that are a source of irritation, as well as productive of much litigation.

"In the first place, it should be understood once and for all that so long as capital employs legitimate means for the protection of property rights, that it is to be accorded the protection of the law, but this does not mean that capital may, by improper methods, form combinations for the purpose of preventing labor from organizing for mutual protection. Likewise, it should be definitely understood that the laboring men have the right to use peaceable and lawful methods to unite their forces in order to improve their condition as respects their ability to earn a decent living; give their children moral and intellectual training; and secure the enactment of legislation requiring mine owners to adopt such methods as may be necessary to keep their mines in a sanitary condition, and, above all, to adopt methods to minimize, as much as possible, the occurrence of the awful catastrophes by which so many human lives have been lost. It should be understood that when a controversy arises between labor and capital that the use of dynamite or any other unlawful methods on the part of the representatives of labor, whereby property and human lives are destroyed, is not to be tolerated by the courts.

"The relative rights of the parties are entitled to equal consideration, and we feel sure that when such controversies arise that they will be dealt with in the same spirit that actuates the courts in adjusting the differences between individuals, wherein questions are involved affecting the ordinary transactions of life.

"Until it is provided by state and national legislation that labor disputes shall be settled by arbitration, it will be the duty of the courts to determine questions of this character, when a proper case is presented. Under the law as it now exists, when property or personal rights are involved, the courts alone can furnish adequate relief. However, while this is true, we think that care and caution should be exercised in the issuance of injunctions of this character.

"We are inclined to the belief that in some instances a reasonable delay in the issuance of the writ would have a tendency to bring about a settlement between the parties by which the rights of both could be amply protected, and thus avoid the expense incident to litigation, to say nothing about the injury sustained by the employer as well as the employe, occasioned by the suspension of operations.

"In no instance should a union be restrained from using lawful and peaceable methods for the purpose of maintaining its organization, but while this is true, the court should restrain those who by violence, coercion, and intimidation seek to deprive the mine owner of the right to use his property as he may see fit.

"We have carefully considered the cases relied upon by the plaintiff, but are of opinion that they do not apply to case at bar. For the reasons stated, the decree of the court below is reversed, and the cause remanded with instructions to dismiss the bill at plaintiff's costs." Record pp. 893, 894, 895, 896.

This Court has this to say on public policy:

> "This Court can know nothing of public policy except from the constitution and the laws, and the course of administration and decision. It has no legislative powers. It cannot amend or modify any legislative acts. It cannot examine questions as expedient or inexpedient, as politic or impolitic; considerations of that sort must, in general, be addressed to the legislature. Questions of policy determined there are concluded here."
> License Tax Cases, 1867, 5 Wall. 462, 469. 18 Law. ed. 497, 500.

And in the case of the Baltimore & Ohio Southwestern Railway Company v. Voight (1900), 176 U. S. 498, 505; 44 L. ed. 560, 565; 20 S. C. 385, Mr. Justice Shiras, in delivering the opinion of the Supreme Court, said:

> "It must not be forgotten that the right of private contract is no small part of the liberty of the citizen, and that the usual and most important function of courts of justice is rather to maintain and enforce contracts than to enable parties thereto to escape from their obligation on the pretext of public policy, unless it clearly appear that they contravene public right or the public welfare. It was well said by Sir George Jessel, M. R., in Printing & N. Registering Co. v. Sampson, L. R. 19 Eq. 465: 'It must not be forgotten that you are not to extend arbitrarily those rules which say that a given contract is void as being against public policy, because if there is one thing which more than another public policy requires, it is that men of full age and competent understanding shall have the utmost liberty of contracting, and that their contracts, when entered into freely and voluntarily, shall be held sacred, and shall be enforced by courts of justice. Therefore, you have this paramount public policy to consider—that you are not lightly to interfere with this freedom of contract.' "

To uphold the contract as lawful and to enjoin the defendants from inducing by peaceable means breaches thereof by one of the parties thereto will not contravene public right or the public welfare.

The Hitchman Company is contending for its right to enjoy what is shown by the Federal Constitution and its amendments and by the Constitution of the State of West Virginia to be a public right.

And the fact that there is no legislative enactment, and no decided case which supports the last quoted portion of the opinion of the Circuit Court of Appeals, shows that the doctrine announced by the Circuit Court of Appeals in that opinion is not one which is called for by the public welfare.

In denying to the Hitchman Company the enforcement of the Company's inherent and Federal and State constitutional rights to freedom of contract, the Circuit Court of Appeals misapplied the law applicable to and overlooked the facts of the Hitchman Company's case.

The Circuit Court of Appeals says:

> "This is an age of co-operation through organization. In fact organization is the only means by which united effort can be secured in any branch of human endeavor. The doctors, dentists, school teachers, wholesale and retail merchants, bankers and manufacturers, and in fact every branch of industry in this country, are organized for the purpose of the mutual protection of the respective parties interested. Such being the case, it is just as essential, and perhaps more important, that the laboring people should organize for their advancement and protection, than it is for any of the vocations we have mentioned." Record pp. 893, 894.

The Record shows that the employes of the Hitchman Company have a union of their own and operate under a charter procured from the State of West Virginia, and that their organization is known as "Independent Mine Workers of West Virginia." A copy of the charter is Albert Jarrett's Exhibit No. 1. Record p. 839, sec. 25.

NOTE.—The Record says "Albert Harrett's Exhibit No. 1," meaning "Albert Jarrett's Exhibit No. 1."

The Independent Mine Workers of West Virginia are not connected with the United Mine Workers of America.

At the time the defendant officers, representing the United Mine Workers of America, called out on strike April 16, 1906, plaintiff's employes in aid of the national strike which had been called by the national officers of the United Mine Workers' organization, and which went into effect on the first day of April, 1906, plaintiff's employes were members of the United Mine Workers of America. After an idleness of about two months, during which time the men became greatly dissatisfied with their Union because of the failure of the Union's officials to pay the men the benefits they were entitled to receive from their organization during time of strike, the men who had been in the employ of the Hitchman Company left the United Mine Workers of America and surrendered to the parent organization the charter for the local which they had operated under for some time up to April 16, 1906, and having surrendered their charter to the United Mine Workers of America, the employes formed the Independent Mine Workers of West Virginia.

The reasons of the men employed by the Hitchman Company for breaking away from the United Mine Workers of America, surrendering their charter from that organization, and taking out a charter from the State of West Virginia for the Independent Mine Workers of West Virginia, are fully explained in the testimony of plaintiff's witnesses, as follows:

Oliver, Record, pp. 384–393.
Corn, Record, pp. 393–399.
Daugherty, Record, pp. 410–438.
Albert Jarrett, Record, pp. 444–449.
James Jarrett, Record, pp. 450–458.
Myers, Record, pp. 536–542.
Rowand, Record, pp. 377–384, 543–546.
Popage, Record, pp. 547–549.

The Circuit Court of Appeals then goes on to say:

> "Therefore we deem it our duty to define the rights of the parties to this controversy, in so far as we may under the facts of this case, so as to set at rest as many as possible of the vexatious questions that are a source of irritation, as well as productive of much litigation.
> "In the first place, it should be understood once and for all that so long as capital employs legitimate means for the protection of property rights, that it is to be accorded the protection of the law, but this does not mean that capital may, by improper methods, form combinations for the purpose of preventing labor from organizing for mutual protection." Record p. 894.

There is no suggestion in the record anywhere that the Hitchman Company has employed, or that it contemplates employing, any illegitimate means for the protection of its property rights. Neither is there in the record any suggestion that by improper methods it has entered into, or contemplates entering into, any combination for the purpose of preventing labor from organizing for mutual protection.

The Hitchman Company has merely employed an entirely legitimate and a highly necessary means for the protection of its property rights by contracting with each of its employes—that while the Hitchman Company furnishes such employe work, such employe will not become a member of the United Mine Workers of America.

In the case of Adair v. United States (1907), 208 U. S. 161, 173, Mr. Justice Harlan, delivering the opinion of the Court, quoted approvingly, as follows:

> " 'It is a part of every man's civil rights that he be left at liberty to refuse business relations with any person whomsoever, whether the refusal rests upon reason, or is the result of whim, caprice, prejudice, or malice. With his reasons neither the public nor third persons have any legal concern. It is also his right to have business relations with anyone with whom he can make contracts, and, if he is wrongfully deprived of this right by others, he is entitled to redress.' "

With the reasons of the Hitchman Company for contracting that its employes shall not be members of the United Mine Workers of America, and that if they desire to become members of that organization they shall withdraw from the employment of the Hitchman Company, neither the public nor third persons have any legal concern.

The Circuit Court of Appeals further says:

> "In no instance should a union be restrained from using lawful and peaceful methods for the purpose of maintaining its organization." Record p. 895.

The issue in this case is not whether the United Mine Workers of America may use lawful and peaceable methods for the purpose of maintaining its organization, because it may solicit membership from men who are not employes of the Hitchman Company and from men who have not agreed that they will not join the United Mine Workers of America while they are employed by their then employer.

If the United Mine Workers of America are to be held to be entitled to induce breaches of contracts between the Hitchman Company and that Company's employes because that organization has elected to try to batter down the barriers which that Company has by its contracts with its employes created to protect itself from being compelled to do business with the United Mine Workers of America, then such breaching of the contracts can only be done through legislative enactment. It cannot be done by judicial decree as public policy. And the Hitchman Company claims that such a thing cannot lawfully be done even by the Congress of the United States or by the Legislature of the State of West Virginia.

Speaking to the point of legislative power, Mr. Justice Harlan in Adair v. United States, 208 U. S. 179, 52 L. ed. 444 and 52 L. ed. 445, says:

> "If such a power exists in Congress it is difficult to perceive why it might not, by absolute regulation, require interstate carriers, under penalties, to employ, in the conduct of its interstate business, only members of labor organizations, or only those who are not members of such organizations—a power which could not be recognized as existing under the Constitution of the United States."

"Every man has a right to pursue his trade or calling without molestation or obstruction, and anyone who by any act, though it be not otherwise unlawful, molests or obstructs him is guilty of a wrong, unless he can show lawful justification or excuse for so doing."

The foregoing is the doctrine broadly laid down in the ancient case of Keeble v. Hickeringill, 11 East, 574 n.

"If one wantonly and maliciously, whether for his own benefit or not, induce a person to violate his contract with a third person to the injury of that third person, it is actionable."

LABOR UNIONS ARE NOT EXEMPT FOR THE REASON THAT THEY ARE LABOR UNIONS FROM THE APPLICATION OF THE LAW AGAINST TORTIOUS INTERFERENCE WITH THE CONTRACTUAL RELATIONS OF OTHERS.

"No one can legally excuse himself to a man, of whose contract he has procured the breach, on the ground that he acted on a wrong understanding of his own rights, or without malice, or bona fide, or in the best interests of himself, nor even that he acted as an altruist, seeking only the good of another and careless of his own advantage."

The case of Flaccus v. Smith et al. (1901), 199 Pennsylvania, 128, is analogous to the Hitchman case.

Flaccus was the proprietor of glass works at Tarentum, Pennsylvania. He ran his works non-union, and his employes consisted of men and apprentices, all of whom had agreed with their employer not to connect themselves with the Union, which in that case was otherwise known as the American Flint Glass Workers' Union, affiliated with the American Federation of Labor.

The defendants in the case, W. J. Smith and others, were members of the American Flint Glass Workers' Union, and they tried to unionize the plaintiff's glass works at Tarentum by persuading the plaintiff's employes to join their Union. Flaccus, the plaintiff, brought his suit in the Court of Common Pleas, No. 2, for Allegheny County, to enjoin the defendants from interfering with his apprentices, and upon the Court, upon final hearing, enjoining the defendants from doing the acts complained of and from persuading the apprentices to join the Union, the defendants appealed.

In the report of the case, as decided by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, Judge Brown delivering the opinion of the Court, said (54 L. R. A. 642):

> "The court below found that Skelley, one of the appellants, had gatherings of the apprentices of the appellee at his room in a hotel and persuaded them to join the union referred to; that he knew the character of the appellee's works as an independent factory, in which members of the union were not employed and that his apprentices were bound in their identures not to join or become subject to the rules or regulations of any such organization as he represented; that he knew these facts at the time he swore in these apprentices as members of the union; that the apprentices who joined the union violated the covenant of their indenture and subjected themselves to the orders of the union, which made obedience to it paramount to obedience to their employer; that the object of Skelley was to break down the appellee's factory as a non-union factory, either by preventing the operation of his works or compelling him to join the union; that the apprentices who joined the union, enticed and persuaded so to do by Skelley, violated an express covenant of their indenture, which was one of great importance to the appellee, and Skelley so knew at the time he so enticed them; that Skelley's conduct and actions were very injurious to the appellee and his business, and, if repeated and persisted in, would in all probability utterly ruin his business; that Skelley's co-defendants, by their counsel, openly and boldly justified him in all he did, contending that, as an officer or agent of the union, he had a perfect right to interfere with plaintiff's apprentices, persuade them to join the union, and secretly swear them in as members; that, if the union had that right, either Skelley or some other agent could go to Tarentum at any time and interfere with the appellee's apprentices and business until it would be destroyed."

In deciding the case Judge Brown said:

"This is not a controversy between the employer and his employes, but between him and certain individuals associated as a labor union, unfriendly to the employment of independent labor, and seeking to induce the apprentices of the employer to violate the terms of their indentures with him. No question is here raised by the employer as to what his employes may or may not do, and the complaint sets forth no misconduct by them for which relief is asked. The appellants, outsiders, having no connection with the business of the appellee, are charged with enticing and endeavoring to entice the young men employed by him to violate the covenants of their apprenticeships with him, and protection is prayed for against > the threatened ruin of his business, as found by the court below. Having reviewed all the evidence, we are not persuaded that any of the court's findings of fact ought to be disturbed, and, with them before us, the only question to be determined is whether the injunction should go out."

And on the same page (54 L. R. A. 642) in affirming the action of the lower court, Judge Brown for the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, said:

> "The appellee had an unquestioned right, in the conduct of his business, to employ workmen who were independent of any labor union, and he had the further right to adopt a system of apprenticeship which excluded his apprentices from membership in such a union. He was responsible to no one for his reasons in adopting such a system, and no one had a right to interfere with it to his prejudice or injury. Such an interference with it was an interference with his business, and, if unlawful, cannot be permitted. The Court found that the interference was injurious to him, and, if allowed to continue, would utterly ruin his business. The damages resulting from such an injury are incapable of ascertainment at law, and justice demands that specific relief be furnished in a court of equity. The test of equity jurisdiction is the absence of a plain and adequate remedy at law to the injured party, depending upon the character of the case as disclosed in the pleadings. If equity alone can furnish relief, the injunction must be issued."

The Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit in deciding the case of Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company v. Bitterman et al. (1906), 75 C. C. A. 192, 144 Fed. 34, quoted and relied upon Angle v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co., and cited approvingly Flaccus v. Smith, and the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit above referred to was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States in 207 U. S. 205.

Of this same case of Flaccus v. Smith, the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, in deciding the case of American Malting Company v. Keitel (1913), 209 Fed. 351, 359, said:

> "In Flaccus v. Smith, 199 Pa. 128, 48 Atl. 894, 54 L. R. A. 640, 85 Am. St. Rep. 779, an injunction issued to a third person, an officer of a labor union, restraining him from enticing the plaintiff's apprentices to break their contract of employment; they having agreed at the time of their employment not to become members of a union while working for the plaintiff. The court below had found as a fact that, if the interference was allowed to continue, it would ruin the plaintiff's business."

The Supreme Court of the United States has said:

> "Society itself is an organization, and does not object to organizations for social, religious, business, and all legal purposes. The law, therefore, recognizes the right of workingmen to unite and to invite others to join their ranks, thereby making available the strength, influence, and power that come from such association. By virtue of this right, powerful labor unions have been organized.
> "But the very fact that it is lawful to form these bodies, with multitudes of members, means that they have thereby acquired a vast power, in the presence of which the individual may be helpless. This power, when unlawfully used against one, cannot be met, except by his purchasing peace at the cost of submitting to terms which involve the sacrifice of rights protected by the Constitution; or by standing on such rights, and appealing to the preventive powers of a court of equity. When such appeal is made, it > is the duty of government to protect the one against the many, as well as the many against the one."

> Gompers v. Buck's Stove & R. Co. (1911), 55 L. ed. 797, 805, 221 U. S. 418, 439.

If the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit is law then it is correct to say that capital and labor, as respective classes, are so in conflict that each has a lawful interest in injuring the other.

In discussing this proposition the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit says:

> "So far as the record in this case shows, there was no complaint by any of the company's employes regarding wages or the conditions of service, nor does it appear that the demanded wage scale was higher than the wages being paid. It is the fair inference from the record that the contest was wholly over "recognition." A concerted effort by strikers to cripple an employer's business, by persuading his workmen away from him, is an injury which requires justification, but it is permitted because it is incidental to the full exercise of the employes' clear and established right to strike for the improvement of their own condition. Such unlawfulness as there might otherwise be in that campaign of persuasion is merged in the dominant right to promote directly their own interest by effectually carrying on their contest. It may well be that the limits of lawful persuasion, when exercised by employes in the course of a strike by them to force from their employer better terms or conditions for themselves and as a means collateral to their side of the conflict, are wider than are such limits in a case where there is no complaint by employes, but where the strike is directed by officials of a labor organization for the primary purpose of compelling its recognition. In the one case, the benefit to the striking employes through winning their contest is immediate and direct; indeed, its primary purpose is to improve the specific, existing conditions, and the injury to the employer's business is measurably incidental. In the other case, injury to the employer's business is the primary object, sought for the purpose of compelling a result said to be for the benefit of the working miners of several states grouped as a class, and for the benefit of these employes of this employer only in a remote or contingent or uncertain way. To say that every weapon lawful in a conflict between an employer and his workmen, over a question in which each has a direct personal interest, is also lawful as between him and a labor organization to which his men do not belong, is to say that capital and labor, as respective classes, are so in conflict that each has a lawful interest in injuring the other. This we are not prepared to do."

IMMUNITY OF EMPLOYE NOT A NON CONDUCTOR.

If the Hitchman Company suffers loss through its employes quitting its service, and has no right of action against them for the damage done for the reason that they have the right to quit if they want to do so, such fact does not carry with it immunity to the defendants, who, in inducing the employes either to quit working for plaintiff, or to join the union while in plaintiff's employ, disqualifying them for further employment by plaintiff, have controlled the actions of such employes to plaintiff's harm. The immunity of the employe is not a non conductor behind which these defendants may take refuge.

PETITIONER'S CONTRACT IS NOT IN RESTRAINT OF TRADE.

Special reference is here made to the case of Associated Hat Mfrs. v. Baird-Unteidt Company, decided by the Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut, July 13, 1914, (The Atlantic Reporter, Vol. 91, No. 3, pp. 373-380), in which the court said:

> "The United Hatters of North America is an unincorporated association of journeymen hatters, having over 9,000 members, and owning a union label, which it permits to be placed in hats manufactured in factories employing its members solely, and commonly called 'union or closed shops.' * * * On January 12, 1909, the board of directors of the plaintiff passed a resolution that it recommended to the association:
> " 'That the use of the union label to be discontinued in every factory of every member of this association one hour subsequent to the passage of this resolution unless during the said period of one hour the association receives official notice that the label will be restored to and the men immediately placed to work in the factory of the Guyer Company, located in Philadelphia, Pa., under the conditions existing at the time of the withdrawal of the label and men.'
> "* * * On January 15, 1909, the association communicated to all of its members the substance of this resolution, and the defendant and the other members of the plaintiff informed their employes that the union label would no longer be permitted to be used in their factories. Whereupon the employes who were members of the United Hatters, pursuant to its order, quit work, and all of the factories, including the defendants, on January 16, 1909, ceased to manufacture hats, which condition continued until January 29, 1909. The members of the plaintiff knew that a large proportion of the members desired to resume the operation of factories as open shops, and on January 28, 1909, the board of directors of the plaintiff passed the following resolution:

" 'That the board of directors recommend to the association that each member offer situations to operatives as individuals, in their respective factories on February 9, 1909.'

"* * * All of the members of the plaintiff, including the defendant, understood the resolution of January 28, 1909, to mean the hiring of their employes as individuals in an open shop. * * * A vote that each member offer situations to operatives as individuals is a declaration for the open shop. Its purpose was to preserve to employers the right to contract for their labor regardless of its membership in the union. The right to so contract is one of the unalienable rights of every employer of labor. Every employer and employe has, under the law, such freedom of contract. The law will not take it from him, much less declare illegal his effort to establish his right to it. * * * The open shop resolution meant that the employers should be free to hire when they pleased and at such wage as the market for labor fixed, and that the employe should be free to choose his employer and to make his own conditions of employment. The agreement took from each the right to freedom of contract."

At an earlier stage of the opinion the court had said:

"It is too late to question the right of a labor union to make by-laws providing for strikes and to issue its order for a strike in an effort to secure lawful objects by lawful means. Reynolds et al. v. Davis et al., 198 Mass. 294, 84 N. E. 457, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 162. And it may prosecute the strike by any means neither illegal nor in violation of the equal or superior rights of others.

"(1) So, too, the association of employers may enact a by-law giving it the right to order a shut down of the factories of its members, provided the objects sought be within its lawful purposes and the means used be > lawful. And the employer has the right freely to hire his labor in the market without denial or unfair restriction of this right. The order of the association to stop work may curtail this right, but it is not, for this reason, illegal."

It was also claimed by the defendant that the plaintiff association is, by reason of its organization and its by-laws, illegal. "The foundation of this claim is threefold, because: (1) the real purpose and object of the association was to permit it to order a suspension of work by its members; (2) to make agreements relative to the use of the union label; and (3) because the members of the plaintiff were engaged in interstate commerce, the association was a violation of the Sherman Act (Act July 2, 1890, C. 647, 26 Stat. 209 [U. S. Comp. S. 1901, p. 3200]), as its purposes were in restraint of trade." In answer to such contentions the court said:

> "We do not think it necessary to discuss the proposition that a vote by employers to conduct their factories as open shops and to exercise their right to hire their labor as individuals, and not as members of a labor union, is a restraint of trade within the Sherman Act. Nor do we think the proposition tenable that the object of the association was the making of the arbitration agreement which the plaintiff had with the United Hatters, and that it was void because it involved the exclusive employment by the members of the plaintiff of union labor. The arbitration agreement does not bear this construction, and its making was a mere incident of the business of the plaintiff. Moreover, it did not relate to, or enter into, the vote for the open shop. * * * The open shop resolution meant that the employers should be free to hire where they pleased and at such wage as the market for labor fixed, and that the employe should be free to choose his employer and to make his own conditions of employment. The agreement took from each the right to freedom of contract. These employers knew what they were engaged upon, for, simultaneously with this agreement, they agreed with each other to indemnify against any liability which might arise to the plaintiff. Had they in good faith intended to run an open shop, would they have felt it essential to make provision for the contingency of their agreement being held to be a violation of their obligation to the plaintiff? In fact, the agreement was to hire exclusively union labor. The contracting employers included all the manufacturers, with two exceptions, in the chief industry of the Danbury district.

"We held in Connors v. Connolly et al., 86 Conn. 641, such an agreement against public policy and void. Meritorious as the effort of these mediators to settle a strike of fatal consequences to large communities was, we can not let our sympathy for the peacemaker cause us to forget that the security of society depends in great measure upon the preservation, inviolable, of the obligations of men."

In Styles v. Lyon, 87 Conn. p. 23, the court held:

"A contract in partial restraint of trade will not, as a rule, be held to be against public policy, unless it unduly interferes with the interests of the public.

"The true test of reasonableness is whether the restrictive provision is necessary to protect the legitimate interests of the employer as affected by the contract of employment."

"An agreement in restraint of trade must satisfy the following conditions:

(1) It must be reasonable.
(2) It must be founded on good consideration.
(3) It must not be too vague."

27 Halsbury's Laws of England, p. 553.

"Trade and Trade Unions."
§1073. "Restraint of Trade by Agreement."

"In estimating the reasonableness of a restraint, the paramount consideration which has to be taken into account is whether it is reasonably necessary for the protection of the interest of the covenantee, unless, it seems, there can be established some specific ground of public policy which must be taken to override the interest of the covenantee."

Ib. §1077.

"There cannot be a restraint of trade in gross—the restraint must be for the protection of a business in which the covenantee is interested."

Ib. §1078.

"There must be a valuable and legal consideration, even though the covenant be by deed. The consideration may be shown either on the face of the agreement or by extrinsic evidence, or may be reasonably inferred from the agreement."

Ib. §1095.

"A consideration is sufficient if it has some value and is not merely illusory. Mere employment at will is a sufficient consideration, so is the continuation of an existing employment at will."

Ib. §1097.

"When once it is established that there is a consideration of some value, the court will not inquire into its adequacy."

Ib. §1099.

"The ordinary rules of contract apply in all questions as to parties to an agreement in restraint of trade."

Ib. §1102.

"In construing a contract which is in restraint of trade, the ordinary rules applicable to contracts must be applied."

Ib. §1105.

"A valid covenant in restraint of trade will be enforced by injunction notwithstanding that it provides for the payment of a sum by way of liquidated damages."

Ib. §1117.

Reference should here be made to the recent English case of Howard v. Danner, decided in the Chancery Division of the High Court, on June 4, 1901, by Byrne, J., and reported in The Times Law Reports, vol. XVII, p. 548. In that case, "The receiver and manager of a restaurant business, appointed by the court in certain chancery proceedings, required each of the waiters at the restaurant to sign an agreement that in consideration of the employer retaining the waiter's services at 4s. per week, the latter agreed not to enter into the services of a new restaurant, about to be opened in the vicinity, during the current year, and in case of a breach to pay £1 a day for every day he might remain in the service of the new restaurant, as liquidated damages. Held, that the receiver and manager had authority to enter into the agreement, and that it was a reasonable agreement necessary for the protection of the business." After stating the facts the Justice said: "The present agreement with the defendant was, in his opinion, a reasonable agreement and a proper one under the circumstances, for the due protection of the Café Royal business and the estate of the testator; for it was obvious that a general defection of waiters to a rival establishment distant only two doors away, might do a great deal of mischief to plaintiff's business, and the plaintiff was well advised in taking the steps he did to prevent anything of this kind being possible."

And here the fact should be emphasized that in the case just cited the complaint was against a competitor, while in the case at bar the complaint is against an intermeddler. A Labor Union is not a competitor of the employer. The Supreme Court of New Jersey, in the case of George Jonas Glass Company v. Glass Bottle Blowers' Association of the United States and Canada, et. al. (1907, N. J. Eq. 66 Atl. 953), said: "A labor organization seeking to compel a manufacturer to unionize his plant is not such a competitor in the labor market as to justify it in enticing employes to leave the service of their master, or to induce persons seeking employment with him from so doing, when the enticer does not employ labor. The competition which the law upholds must be honest competition, and not a malicious attempt to injure another."

RIGHT OF PETITIONER TO INJUNCTIVE RELIEF.

In the Flaccus case, heretofore cited, the court stated the precise issue before it in these terms: "This is not a controversy between the employer and his employes, but between him and certain individuals associated as a labor union, unfriendly to the employment of independent labor, and seeking to induce the apprentices of the employer to violate the terms of their indentures with him. No question is here raised by the employer as to what his employes may or may not do, and the complainant sets forth no misconduct by them for which relief is asked." In speaking of such "relief" the court said: "that the interference was injurious to him [the employer], and, if allowed to continue, would utterly ruin his business. The damages resulting from such an injury are incapable of ascertainment at law, and justice demands that specific relief be furnished in a court of equity." So in this case the controversy is not "between the employer and his employes, but between him and certain individuals associated as a labor union, unfriendly to the employment of independent labor," who are seeking to induce the employes of petitioner to violate the terms of their contract with petitioner. As the damages resulting from such an injury is this case, as in the Flaccus case, "are incapable of ascertainment at law, * * * justice demands that specific relief be furnished in a court of equity." And so in the Bitterman case, heretofore quoted, this court said: "Concluding, as we do, that the commission of a legal wrong by the defendants was disclosed by the case as made, we are brought to consider the several contentions concerning the jurisdiction of the court and its right to afford relief. * * * Besides, the substantial character of the jurisdictional averment in the bill is to be tested, not by the more immediate pecuniary damage resulting from the acts complained of, but by the value of the business to be protected and the rights of property, which the complainant sought to have recognized and enforced. * * * The contention that, though it be admitted, for the sake of argument, that the acts charged against the defendant 'were wrongful, tortious, or even fraudulent,' there was no right to resort to equity because there was a complete and adequate remedy at law to redress the threatened wrong when committed, is, we think, also devoid of merit. * * * The circuit court of appeals decided that error had been committed in refusing to grant an injunction against dealing in non-transferable tickets to be issued in the future, and directed that the decree below be enlarged in that particular. It is insisted that the circuit court of appeals erred in awarding an injunction as to dealings 'in non-transferable tickets that may be hereafter issued * * * since it thereby undertook to promulgate' a rule applicable to conditions and circumstances which have not yet arisen, and to prohibit 'the petitioners from dealing in tickets not in esse * * * and is, therefore, violative of the most fundamental principles of our government.' But when the broad nature of this proposition is considered, it but denies that there is power in a court of equity in any case to afford effective relief by injunction. Certain it is that every injunction, in the nature of things, contemplates the enforcement, as against the party enjoined, of a rule of conduct for the future as to the wrong to which the injunction relates. Take the case of trespasses upon land where the elements entitling to equitable relief exist. See Slater v. Gunn, 170 Mass. 509, and cases cited. It may not be doubted that the authority of a court would extend, not only to restraining a particular imminent trespass, but also to prohibiting like acts for all future time. The power exerted by the court below which is complained of, was in no wise different. * * * The action of the circuit court of appeals, therefore, in causing the injunction to apply not only to the illegal dealings as to the then outstanding tickets, but to like dealings as to similar tickets which might be issued in the future, was but the exertion by the court of its power to restrain the continued commission against the rights of complainant in the future of a definite character of acts adjudged to be wrongful." An inspection of the record will show that the injunction issued in the case at bar conforms, in every particular, with the foregoing rule as this court has defined it.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

I.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE.

At its last term this Court made the following order:

> "No. 241 Hitchman Coal & Coke Company, appellant and petitioner, v. John Mitchell, individually, et al. Appeal from and petition for a writ of certiorari to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit. Per Curiam:
>
> "(1) Appeal dismissed for want of jurisdiction upon the authority of Shulthis v. McDougal (225 U. S., 561, 569); Omaha Electric Light and Power Co. v. Omaha (230 U. S., 123); St. Anthony Church v. Pennsylvania R. R. Co. (237 U. S. 575, 576, 577).
> "(2) Considering the petition for certiorari hitherto filed and upon which action was previously postponed until the merits of the case came to be disposed of, it is ordered that the said petition be, and the same is, granted, the record on appeal to stand as a return to the writ of certiorari. It is further ordered that the case on the return to the writ of certiorari be placed on the docket for argument before a full bench."

From the record on appeal, which now stands as a return to the writ of certiorari, granted as aforesaid, it appears that your petitioner, the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company, on October 24, 1907, commenced, in the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of West Virginia, a suit in equity for injunctive relief against the above named respondents, averring among other things, the following:

THE PLAINTIFF is a West Virginia corporation operating a coal mine at Benwood, West Virginia, near Wheeling;

(a) Primarily, to supply coal to the B. & O. R. R. engines at its yards at Benwood, West Virginia, four miles below Wheeling, for which trade a contract was made before the mine was opened. Such coal is termed "Engine Coal."

(b) Secondarily, to ship coal to the general markets, local and otherwise, as its production became great enough in the course of its development to admit of that trade. Such coal is termed "Commercial Coal."

Its Trade consists of about half engine and half commercial coal.

Engine coal must be mined and delivered with regularity and without the shut-downs that are incident to strikes.

The same is true as to mining coal for the lake trade. It can only be mined and shipped while lake navigation is open.

Mines in Ohio near Wheeling are plaintiff's competitors in supplying engine coal and in shipping coal for the lake trade.

These Ohio mines are union, that is, they are operated under contracts entered into between the operators and officials of the United Mine Workers of America.

The Hitchman Mine opened up and was run non-union to April 1, 1903, was run union to April 16, 1906, and has run non-union since June 12, 1906; it never had any shutdown or suspension even for one day running non-union; and it has lost no time by reason of labor troubles since June 12, 1906.

Since resuming non-union June 12, 1906, the Hitchman Company has made individual contracts with its employees whereby it aims to protect itself against the United Mine Workers of America, in the efforts of that organization to unionize its mine again, and that agreement is evidenced by memorandum cards, signed by the men, reading as follows:

> "I am employed by, and work for, the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company, with the express understanding that I am not a member of the United Mine Workers of America, and will not become so while an employee of the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company, and that the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company is run non-union, and agrees with me that it will run non-union while I am in its employ. If at any time while I am employed by the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company I want to become connected with the United Mine Workers of America, or any affiliated organization, I agree to withdraw from the employment of said company, and agree that while I am in the employ of that company I will not make any effort amongst its employees to bring about the unionizing of that mine, against the company's wish. I have either read the above or heard same read."

The wages paid by the Hitchman Company are the same except in one instance and in that instance a little better than the wages paid by mines operated under the United Mines Workers' scale.

In the unionized State of Ohio 16 or 17 days in the month constitute a high average and many engaged in the mines decline to labor more than 12 or 14 days.

THE DEFENDANTS are the national officers of the United Mine Workers of America, the officers of District No. 6, which covers the State of Ohio and the Northern Panhandle of West Virginia, and the officers of Subdistrict No. 5 of District No. 6, which covers the southeastern portion of Ohio and the Panhandle in West Virginia.

The reason for including the West Virginia Panhandle in the Ohio District is that the vein of coal mined in southeastern Ohio and in the West Virginia Panhandle is the same and that mining conditions and markets are the same, the latter being competitive.

The United Mine Workers of America and their district and their sub-district organizations are voluntary and no one of them is incorporated.

More than two-thirds of their total membership is in the States of Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois.

In signing the scale for the operation of a union mine the officials of the United Mine Workers contract for and enforce the closed shop, under which agreement no man may work at the mine who is not a member of the United Mine Workers of America.

States in which closed shop agreements are made and enforced by the United Mine Workers of America are Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Missouri, Oklahoma, Texas, Arkansas, part of Kentucky, part of British Columbia, part of Washington, all Wyoming, all Montana, part of Central Pennsylvania and greater part of Western Pennsylvania.

The controversy between plaintiff and the defendants hinges upon efforts of the United Mine Workers of America to carry out a contract with union operators and to advance the cause of their own union.

In its bill petitioner avers that the defendants

> "have agreed, confederated, combined and formed themselves into a conspiracy, under the name of the United Mine Workers of America, to unlawfully persuade, entice and procure your orator's miners or mine workers, employed by your orator and working for your orator in or around your orator's mine, to break, violate and disregard their several contracts with your orator, all with the avowed purpose of compelling your orator to unionize its plant, without your orator's consent, and to such end have unlawfully and maliciously agreed, confederated, combined and formed themselves into a conspiracy to compel by threats and intimidation and by other unlawful means your orator's said employes to join the Union and to apply to their own relation with your orator, in the matter of their employment, the rules of the Union, and to enable said Union to apply its rules and regulations to your orator under penalty of closing down your orator's mine, provided your orator still refuses to unionize its plant and recognize the Union.

"Your orator says that it has no contractual relation whatever with any one of the defendants hereto and that each of said defendants is fully aware that your orator is operating a non-union mine and will not consent to operate a Union mine; that its employes are non-union; that said employes are required by your orator at the time of entering service to agree not to become connected with the Union, while employed by your orator, and that if they do join the Union, their employment with your orator shall cease; that with such understanding your orator's employes enter into its employment and that they are now working for your orator under such contract and with such conditions, all of which is known to these defendants and to each of them, as aforesaid.

"Your orator further says that the said John Mitchell, T. L. Lewis, W. B. Wilson, William Green, D. H. Sullivan, George W. Savage, A. R. Watkins, John Zelenka, Lee Rankin and Thomas Hughes, individually, and as officers, agents, employes and servants, as aforesaid, of said United Mine Workers of America and of its said subordinate associations or branches are fully aware that your orator's said employes are satisfied with their employment; that your orator is engaged in mining coal and in fulfilling contracts for coal; that it would be impossible to fulfill those contracts without the labor of its said employes and that it would entail upon your orator great financial loss to have its ability to fulfill its contracts interfered with by the failure of its men to work longer for your orator, and likewise would entail great loss and damage to your orator to have its mine shut down and to have a strike declared, yet your orator says that the said defendants have unlawfully and maliciously agreed together, confederated, combined and formed themselves into a conspiracy, the purpose of which they are proceeding to carry out and are now about to finally accomplish, namely: to cause your orator's mine to be shut down, its plant to remain idle, its contracts to be broken and unfulfilled until such time as your orator shall submit to the demand of the Union, that it shall unionize its plant, and having submitted to such demand unionize its plant by employing only union men who shall become subject to the orders of the Union, paramount to the orders of your orator, their employer, and until in thus unionizing its plant your orator shall surrender its control and the management of its business to the Union under the various rules and regulations laid down by the Union and accede in advance to every demand the said Union by its said officers, agents, employes and servants may make. * * *

"Your orator says that at a Convention of Sub-District 5 of District 6 United Mine Workers of America held at Wheeling, March 14–19, 1907, the said defendants, A. R. Watkins, Lee Rankin, T. L. Lewis, John Zelenka and Thomas Hughes were present and participated in the proceedings.
Said defendant, A. R. Watkins, in his report which he submitted to the Convention as President of Sub-District 5 of District 6 U. M. W. of A. said: 'The general strike in our sub-district last year was characterized by a great deal of bitter feeling by a few operators trying to operate their mines on a non-union basis. The attempt of those operators to operate their mines was defeated by the splendid loyalty of our members in standing shoulder to shoulder in that bitter struggle. You and those who stood so loyally to the organization deserve great credit for your conduct, under the trying conditions that existed in some sections of the district during the strike.' * * * 'At our last Annual Convention it was unanimously decided that the Eastern Ohio scale should apply to the West Virginia Pan Handle counties. The operators of those counties refused to meet us in joint convention to sign a general scale. Some of the operators even refused to sign a contract and this resulted in several local strikes, all of which were settled except the one now on at Elm Grove where the men are on strike and are standing firm.

It is with regret that some of the locals in the Pan Handle broke away and the members went to work without any union or without getting a scale signed.'
* * *

"Your orator says that in refusing to recognize the Union after the declaration of said strike April 1, 1906, and after its men had left your orator's employment, pursuant to said strike, and in thereafter and now running its mine non-union your orator did not seek to reduce the wages of its said employes nor cause its said employes to work for less than the scale of wages established by said United Mine Workers of America, nor does your orator now seek nor contemplate any reduction in the wages of its present employes. Your orator's sole purpose in running non-union and in now insisting upon its right to do so, unhampered by and without interruption from said defendants, acting individually and as representative of the said United Mine Workers of America was and is to escape from the intolerable oppression and vicious intermeddling of the said defendants. * * *

"Yet your orator says that although it has refused to permit it, still the said defendants, further proceeding to carry out their conspiracy, are now endeavoring to unionize your orator's mine, and threaten to, and your orator has reasonable ground to fear that they will, and so alleges, close down your orator's mine and keep it closed until your orator will agree to sign the scale and employ none but union labor.

"Your orator says that on or about September 7, 1907, the defendant, Thomas Hughes, was noticed about the Glendale mine and about the Hitchman mine intercepting the miners, taking lists of names of employes and trying to induce the men by persuasion, threats, coercion and intimidation, and by various other unlawful methods and devices, to quit working for your orator and to join the Union, and such efforts said Hughes is keeping up at each mine, although he has been ordered off of the premises of each mine and has been directed to stay off and to let your orator's employes alone.

"Your orator says that as a result of the labors of the defendant, Hughes, who has been assisted by others of the defendants, from time to time, by their counsel and advice, and aiding and abetting him, with their presence, about your orator's mine and about the Glendale mine, the said defendants succeeded in getting twenty-four of the employes of the Glendale mine to agree to join the Union and to quit the service of the Glendale Coal Company. And your orator says that while the said defendants have so far been unable to bring about or induce your orator's employes to quit its service, still the said Hughes has recently stated to one of your orator's miners whom he was trying to induce to leave your orator's service and join the Union, that he, Hughes, had succeeded in having one hundred and twenty-five men at the Hitchman mine sign their names agreeing to become members of the United Mine Workers of America and that just as soon as he got twenty-five more names he was going to shut the Hitchman mine down, and in this connection your orator says that fifty-four of your orator's present employes have in writing signed a statement that they are satisfied with their employment with your orator, with the wages paid to them, and with their work, and that they would like to remain in your orator's employ. Your orator employs from one hundred and seventy-five to two hundred men at its mine as a general rule and now has in its employ one hundred and sixty to one hundred and seventy-five men.

"Your orator says that the said United Mine Workers of America, the said International Union United Mine Workers of America, the said District No. 6 United Mine Workers of America, and the said Sub-District 5 of District 6 United Mine Workers of America, voluntary associations as aforesaid are under their Constitutions violating the common and statutory law of the State of West Virginia as well as the Constitution of said State; especially in this, to-wit: in the provisions of Section 1, Section 3 and Section 4 of Article X., Constitution International Union, U. M. W. of A.; and in the provisions of Section 1, and Section 2 of Article VIII, and Section 15 of Article IX., Constitution District No. 6, U. M. W. of A.; and in the provisions of Section 2 and Section 3 of Article 1, Section 1 of Article IV., Section 6 of Article VI, and Sections 2 and 3 of Article IX., Constitution Sub-District 5 of District 6, U. M. W. of A.; and as well in the said oath which is administered to each member of the U. M. W. of A. on his initiation. * * *

"Your orator says that the said United Mine Workers of America, including its said subordinate associations or branches is a secret voluntary organization having certain expressed objects, some lawful and others unlawful, and that it is in the endeavor to carry out its unlawful purposes that the matters and things herein complained of by your orator have arisen. * * *

"Your orator says that the said John Mitchell, the said T. L. Lewis, the said W. B. Wilson, acting in their several official capacities hereinbefore stated; the said William Green, the said D. H. Sullivan, the said George W. Savage, acting in their several official capacities hereinbefore stated; the said A. R. Watkins, the said John Zelenka and the said Lee Rankin, acting in their several official capacities hereinbefore stated, are representative of the said United Mine Workers of America, the said International Union United Mine Workers of America, the said District 6 United Mine Workers of America, and the said Sub-District 5 of District 6 United Mine Workers of America, respectively; and that the said Thomas Hughes is acting as an organizer of said United Mine Workers of America, all voluntary associations; that the principal office of said United Mine Workers of America and of said International Union U. M. W. of A. is at Indianapolis, Indiana, the office of said District No. 6 U. M. W. of A. is at Columbus, Ohio, and that said Sub-District 5 of District 6, U. M. W. of A. has no office, business being transacted at the places of residence of the said A. R. Watkins, John Zelenka and Lee Rankin, President, Vice-President and Secretary-Treasurer, respectively, all residing within the State of Ohio as aforesaid; that the jurisdiction of this court is invoked on the ground that your orator is a resident of the Northern District of West Virginia and a citizen of said State, and that each of the said defendants is a resident of a different State, to-wit; no defendant is a resident of the State of West Virginia, and that the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of interest and costs, the sum of two thousand dollars. * * * "

In its bill

"Your orator further says that unless enjoined by this Court, the said defendants acting individually and agreeing, confederating, combining and forming themselves into a conspiracy under the name of the United Mine Workers of America as aforesaid, will, in pursuance of their unlawful purposes and designs, by enticement, persuasion or coercion, in one form or the other, bring about the shutting down of your orator's mine and the ultimate destruction of its business, and will without the consent and against the will of your orator compel your orator to recognize said defendants and said associations in the further transaction of its legitimate business in mining and shipping coal, and will compel your orator to contract with its employes through the said defendants as officers of the said associations under such rules and regulations made and enforced by said associations and by said defendant officers as will enable the Union to dictate the persons whom your orator shall employ and those whom your orator shall discharge, the wages your orator shall pay, and further will compel your orator to agree that each of its future employes as members of the said United Mine Workers of America shall owe and yield to said Union an allegiance which shall in all things be paramount to that which said employes would owe to your orator, and that they will thus take charge of, dictate the management of, and virtually control, your orator's business, and thereby perpetrate acts of oppression and wrong upon your orator which dis- tinctly violate your orator's contractual, common law, statutory and constitutional rights as a citizen of the State of West Virginia.

"Your orator further says that in effecting their said object of unionizing your orator's mine the said defendants propose and threaten to, and your orator being so informed and believing it to be true, alleges on such information and belief that said defendants will and are about to, indulge in all of the many methods of accomplishing their result by the use of threats, intimidation, force, violent or abusive language, picketing your orator's premises, picketing or patrolling or guarding the streets and approaches to your orator's premises and going to the homes or boarding houses of your orator's employes for the purpose of intimidating or coercing them to leave your orator's employment and to picket railroad and street cars passing to and from or through your orator's premises for the purpose of intercepting your orator's employes in going to or from your orator's premises and for the purpose of intercepting and preventing persons coming to your orator's premises for the purpose of seeking or for the purpose of entering into your orator's employment."

After protracted litigation a final decree was rendered in said cause on January 18, 1913, in favor of petitioner, awarding to it a perpetual injunction against the United Mine Workers of America. In the course of his opinion District Judge Dayton said:

> "The final question arises how is this plaintiff, the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company, affected and what right has it to complain and appeal for injunctive relief? The evidence establishes these facts:"

After stating the facts thus established, the Court said:

> "I conclude, therefore, that this organization, known as the United Mine Workers of America, is an unlawful one because, (a) of its principles as set forth in its constitutions, obligation for membership and rules which (1) require its members to surrender their individual freedom of action, (2) seeks to require, in practical effect, all mine workers to become members of it whether desirous of doing so or not, (3) seeks to control, and restrict, if not destroy, the right of the mine owner to contract with its employees independent of the organization, (4) to exclude his right to employ non-union labor if he desires, (5) to limit his right to discharge, in the absence of contract, whom he pleases, when he pleases and for any cause or reason that to him seems proper, (6) assumes the right on its part, by and through its officers, to control the mine owner's business by shutting down his mine, calling out his men upon indefinite strike in obedience to their obligation to the Union, whether the men desire to quit work or not, whenever the Union's officers deem it to be for the best interests of the Union, regardless of the rights and interests of the mine owner, and regardless of his direct loss and damages and such indirect loss and damage as may be incurred by him by reason of the resultant violation of contracts by him with others. Adair v. United States, 208 U. S. 161, 52 L. ed. 436. I further conclude that it is an unlawful organization because, (b) of its procedure and practices in that, (1) it seeks to create a monopoly of mine labor such as to enable it, as an organization, to control the coal mining business of the country, and (2) has by express contract joined in a combination and conspiracy with a body of rival operators, resident in other states, to control, restrain and, to an extent at least, destroy the coal trade of the State of West Virginia. It has spent fourteen years time and hundreds of thousands of dollars in effort to accomplish this unlawful purpose. The rules of law relating to the responsibility of individual members concerned in such combination and conspiracy are plain and well defined. Great latitude in establishing conspiracy by the admission of circumstantial evidence is allowed, circumstances tending in slight degree to a determination of the truth are allowed to be proved. Clune v. United States, 159 U. S. 590, 40 L. ed. 269. The acts and declarations of co-conspirators in execution of a conspiracy are evidence against others of their number. Id. * * *

"In Loewe v. Lawlor, 208 U. S. 274, it was held that the Sherman Anti-Trust Act 'prohibits any combination whatever to secure action which essentially obstructs the free flow of commerce between the States, or restricts, in that regard, the liberty of a trader to engage in business;' and this includes 'restraints of trade aimed at compelling third parties and strangers involuntarily not to engage in the course of interstate trade except on conditions that the combination imposes' and that it 'makes no distinction between classes. Organizations of farmers and laborers were not exempted from its operation, notwithstanding the efforts which the records of Congress show were made in that direction' and that 'a combination of labor organizations and the members thereof, to compel a manufacturer whose goods are almost entirely sold in other states, to unionize his shops and on his refusal so to do to boycott his goods and prevent their sale in states other than his own until such time as the resulting damage forces him to comply with their demands,' is a 'combination in restraint of trade.'

"I further conclude that this Union, in pursuit of its unlawful purposes to secure control and the monopoly of mine labor, and to restrain, suppress, if not destroy, the coal mining industry of West Virginia in the interest of their co-conspirators, rival operators and producers in Ohio, Western Pennsylvania, Illinois and Indiana competitive fields, have sought and still seek to compel the plaintiff, the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company, to submit to contractual relations with it as an organization, relating to the employment of labor and production contrary to the will and wish of said company; that its officers, in pursuance of such unlawful effort to monopolize labor and restrain trade, and with knowledge of the express contracts existing between this plaintiff and its employees, have unlawfully sought to cause the breach of the said contracts on the part of its said employees."

In the course of its opinion the Court also said:

> "As regards the second aspect, the relation of these organizations to the general public as consumers of the products of capital and labor it must be admitted that, in the absence of special legislation such as that of England, (of doubtful constitutionality at least in this country under the written constitutions, Federal and State, thereof) it is just as unlawful for labor to combine to form a trust or monopoly as it is for capital to do so. The same rule of common law governs the one as the other and the Act of Congress, known as the Sherman Anti-Trust Law, I conceive to be simply declaratory of this principle. The latest construction of this act by the Supreme Court set forth in the Standard Oil Company v. United States, 221 U. S. 1 and United States v. American Tobacco Company, 221 U. S. 106, is that 'it prohibits all contracts and combination which amount to an unreasonable or undue restraint of trade in interstate commerce.' By the English authorities, I have hereinbefore cited, it will be perceived that the same doctrine of the 'unreasonable' restraint of trade has been applied there as against these labor organizations."

After citing the case of Adair v. United States, 208 U. S. 161, the Court said:

> "In this latter case the Supreme Court holds such a provision 'to be an invasion of personal liberty as well as of the right of property, guaranteed by the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.' This leaves the Act of June 29, 1886, Ch. 567, 24 Stat. L. 86, 7 Fed. Stat. Ann. 334, entitled 'An Act to legalize the incorporation of National Trade Unions,' as our only Federal law in amendment or modification of the Common Law upon the subject of Trade Unions. * * *

> ositions I have set forth are the principles of law to govern in the determination of this case. * * * It may be unfortunate for those states that nature has favored West Virginia, Kentucky and other southern states by giving them better coal and less expensive mining conditions, but this does not warrant the operators and miners there to combine and confederate for the purpose of depriving the consuming public of the right to purchase the better coal at the lower cost, if desired. Such a combination is clearly a common law conspiracy, too far reaching to be reasonable, in restraint of trade, as well, in my judgment, a direct violation of the Sherman Anti-Trust Law. It is further in my judgment, a combination or conspiracy against the rights of the many thousands of non-union miners in West Virginia who are entitled to enjoy the advantage in their labor that nature has given them.

Concluding his last opinion Judge Dayton said (202 Fed. 556):

> "I further conclude that this union, in pursuit of its unlawful purposes to secure control and the monopoly of mine labor, and to restrain, suppress, if not destroy, the coal mining industry of West Virginia in the interest of their co-conspirators, rival operators and producers in Ohio, Western Pennsylvania, Illinois and Indiana competitive fields, have sought and still seek to compel the plaintiff, the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company, to submit to contractual relations with it as an organization relating to the employment of labor and production contrary to the will and wish of said company; that its officers, in pursuance of such unlawful effort to monopolize labor and restrain trade, and with knowledge of the express contracts existing between this plaintiff and its employes, have unlawfully sought to cause the breach of the said contracts on the part of its said employes. It is admitted in the testimony of Lewis, Sullivan, and Savage that, if this injunction is dissolved, such efforts will be repeated. I do not stop now to further consider the law declaring efforts to secure the breach of contracts unlawful. I have fully considered this question in my former opinion in this case to which I now refer."

In that opinion to which Judge Dayton refers he states the facts as follows (172 Fed. 963-965):

"Upon October 24, 1907, the plaintiff corporation presented its bill for injunction to a judge of this court against John Mitchell and nine others, alleging itself to be a corporation under the laws of West Virginia and the defendants to be citizens and residents of several different states other than West Virginia; that nine of said defendants first named are presidents, vice-presidents, and secretary-treasurers, respectively, of the United Mine Workers of America, and of the International Union United Mine Workers of America, of District No. 6 United Mine Workers of America, and of subdistrict 5 of District No. 6 United Mine Workers of America, and the defendant Thomas Hughes to be an organizing agent of said organizations; that plaintiff is the owner of about 5,000 acres of coal, has a mine and mining plant on the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad that is mining and shipping a daily output of about 1,400 tons of coal, largely under contracts, between 500 and 600 tons to the railroad for its daily engine fuel, and has large contracts for future delivery; that prior to April 1, 1906, it operated its mine by employment of men affiliated with the United Mine Workers of America, but on that day a strike was ordered by the officers of the union, and on April 16, 1906, the men so employed, in obedience to the demands and orders of defendants, went out and ceased to work. It is charged that this strike was ordered because certain other operators refused to sign the scale demanded by the union; that so far as plaintiff was concerned it was wholly without justification or excuse, because it distinctly agreed to pay the scale price and any increased price fixed thereby from April 1, 1906, the date of the strike order, whenever it might be fixed and agreed upon, with which proposition the miners themselves, whose labor was involved, were entirely satisfied; that notwithstanding this, at the instance of defendants, its mine was shut down from April 16 to June 12, 1906, to its great financial loss and embarrassment by reason of its inability to comply with its existing contracts. The bill then sets forth in detail in effect that on the last-named date, in order to be able to run said mine, it entered into a contract with its men whereby it agreed with them to run its mining operation wholly upon a nonunion basis, refusing absolutely to employ any union men, and whereby the men on their part agreed not to join or become members of this union and to work for plaintiff as nonunion men; that plaintiff has since that time been running its mine under this contract with its men to the entire satisfaction of both, paying its men as high wages as paid in any of the union mines. It then charges the officers and agents of the union, with full knowledge of the existence of this contract, to have repeatedly sought to have plaintiff violate it and agree to reunionize its mine, which plaintiff has refused to do, whereupon such union officers and agents are seeking by inducements, threats and intimidation to induce plaintiff's employes, bound by said contract with it, to leave its service, break their contract, join the union, and also to prevent other men from engaging in its employ, and this it is charged with the unlawful purpose to prevent any but union men to work in its mine, compel it to employ none but union men, and to submit its business and its property to the jurisdiction and control of said union and its officers. The bill then proceeds to charge the United Mine Workers' Union of America and its subordinate organizations, to be unincorporated organizations, having unlawful purposes and designs to create a monopoly and trust in coal mining labor, and in support of these allegations sets forth in extenso what purports to be excerpts from the constitutions and by-laws of the supreme and subordinate unions, together with the obligation required to be taken by its members and extracts from the proceedings of its national conventions. A distinct conspiracy on the part of defendants as individuals is charged to secure, by reason of their positions as officers of this union, the abandonment by the men of their contract with plaintiff, their joining the union, the inability of plaintiff to employ others, and the entire shutting down of its mine, to its irreparable loss and injury. Presented with this bill were some 28 affidavits in support of its allegations. A temporary restraining order was granted until the next regular term of court, to be held at Parkersburg on January 14, 1908, for which date plaintiff's motion for a temporary injunction was set down for hearing. This hearing, on motion of defendants, was continued until May 26, 1908, when plaintiff presented more than 20 additional affidavits and argued its motion for temporary injunction; counsel for defense stating they 'did not desire to be heard in opposition to said motion so far as the granting of a temporary injunction at the time was concerned, and not consenting, but objecting, thereto.' The temporary injunction was on that day granted in exact accord with the terms of the restraining order.

"Answers have been filed, exceptions entered thereto, motions as to certain unserved defendants to have said bill dismissed as to them have been made, and a motion by defendants, disclaiming 'any intention of conceding the truth of the allegations of the plaintiff's bill whereby fraud, coercion, and intimidation or violence in any form whatsoever is imputed to them,' has been entered to dissolve the injunction, 'on the face of the bill and exhibits,' in so far as said injunction restrained said defendants, or any of them, from the use of argument, reason, and persuasion, to induce the employes of the plaintiffs, or any of them, to become members of the United Mine Workers of America or any of its subordinate branches; in so far as it restrains them from interfering or talking to any person or persons in the employment of the plaintiff, or about to enter the employment of the plaintiff, for the purpose of inducing such persons to become members of the United Mine Workers of America or any of its subordinate branches, in a peaceable and law-abiding manner, and unaccompanied by intimidation, force, fraud, violence, or coercion; also in so far as it restrains defendants from visiting the homes of platintiff's employes for the purpose of inducing them by reason, persuasion, and argument, unaccompanied by force, fraud, intimidation, violence or coercion, to become members of the United Mine Workers of America or any of its subordinate branches; in so far as it restrains defendants from going near the premises of plaintiff for the purpose of talking with or inducing the employes of plaintiff to become members of the United Mine Workers of America; in so far as it restrains from unionizing or attempting to do so plaintiff's mine, if by 'unionizing' is meant action on the part of defendants to induce the employes of plaintiff to become members of the United Mine Workers of America by the use of argument, persuasion, and reason, unaccompanied by force, violence, coercion or intimidation; and also in so far as it restrains defendants from interfering with plaintiff's employes, if by the term 'interfering' is meant that defendants shall be precluded from interviewing and visiting plaintiff's employes for the purpose of inducing them to become members of the union. This motion, on April 7, 1909, was argued and submitted, and is now to be determined."

And in deciding the contractual rights of the plaintiff Judge Dayton said (172 Fed. 965, et seq.):

"It is to be borne in mind that this motion is made only for partial dissolution, and that, too, without prejudice to defendants' right to move for full dissolution upon final hearing. It is based solely upon the ground that the allegations of the bill on its face warrant, if they do not demand it. Under these circumstances, while I am entitled to construe the allegations of the bill, and all of them, in the light most favorable to the plaintiff as upon demurrer, I am not inclined, at this time, to consider the charges, substantially made, that the United Mine Workers of America is an unlawful organization seeking to establish a monopoly in labor contrary to the common law, or a trust therein contrary to the Sherman act (Act July 2, 1890, c. 647, 26 Stat. 209 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3200]). Such questions deserve more consideration than I have had time yet to give them and may well be postponed to the final hearing after the case has been fully made up, if it then becomes necessary to decide them under the conditions at that time existing.

Nor do I regard it necessary to discuss the utility or futility of labor organizations. The right of labor to organize for its mutual benefit and protection is as well settled and determined by law as the right of capital to organize for the same purpose. That one may resort to the voluntary association of individuals without incorporation and the other to articles of incorporation is wholly immaterial, provided the voluntary association be one for lawful purposes and be conducted in lawful manner. That such associations may be secret in character, may have and enforce by-laws, and act through officers and agents, cannot longer be disputed. Their members may stand together, may accumulate funds for the support of those of their number not employed, may unite with other unions, may advise with their officers and others as to their interests and employment, may expel those who refuse obedience to the authority of the association's laws, and may individually or collectively peaceably leave their employer's service when the terms thereof become unsatisfactory to them, as so clearly set forth by Taft, Judge, in Thomas v. C., N. O. & T. P. Ry. Co. (C. C.) 62 Fed. 803, by Thayer, Judge, in Hopkins v. Oxley Stave Co., 83 Fed. 912, 28 C. C. A. 99, and by Justice Harlan in Arthur v. Oakes, 11 C. C. A. 209, 63 Fed. 310, 25 L. R. A. 414. It is absolutely needless to add that, under ordinary circumstances, the right of the members of a labor union to solicit others and by reason, argument and persuasion induce them to join their labor associations is just as clear a right as that of members of fraternal organizations, such as Masons, Odd Fellows, and the like, to do the same thing. While all these things are true, it is not to be forgotten that associations organized for the best and noblest purposes, church organizations even, may be misused by those who have secured control for the purpose and prostituted them to unlawful purposes and designs. When this is done, it becomes as much the duty of the law to restrain them from lawlessness as is its duty to stay the hand of the legally incorporated company of capital that has perverted its lawful purposes to lawless deeds.

"It is necessary for us in this case to recognize that this is not a controversy between plaintiff and its employes; it is not a strike; it is not a case where the labor union has longer any legitimate interest or concern. If the allegations of this bill are true, the employes of this company are not members of this union, but have actually contracted with the company not to become members of it as a condition precedent to their employment. Mr. Justice Harlan, in Adair v. United States, 208 U. S. 161, 28 Sup. Ct. 277, 52 L. Ed. 436, speaking for the Supreme Court, says:

"'While, as already suggested, the right of liberty and property, guaranteed by the Constitution against deprivation without due process of law, is subject to such reasonable restraint as the common good or the general welfare may require, it is not within the functions of government—at least, in the absence of contract between the parties—to compel any person, in the course of his business and against his will, to accept or retain the personal services of another, or to compel any person, against his will, to perform personal services for another. The right of a person to sell his labor upon such terms as he deems proper is, in its essence, the same as the right of the purchaser of labor to prescribe the conditions upon which he will accept such labor from the person offering to sell it. So the right of the employe to quit the service of the employer, for whatever the reason, is the same as the right of the employer, for whatever reason, to dispense with the services of such employe. It was the legal right of the defendant, Adair, however unwise such a course may have been, to discharge Coppage because of his being a member of a labor organization, as it was the legal right of Coppage, if he saw fit to do so, however unwise such a course on his part might have been, to quit the service in which he was engaged, because the defendant employed some persons who were not members of a labor organization. In all such particulars the employer and the employe have equality of right, and any legislation that disturbs that equality is an arbitrary interference with the liberty of contract, which no government can legally justify in a free land.'

"And many cases are cited in support of these principles. It necessarily follows that if the employer can discharge his employe because he belongs to a labor organization, and if the employe can quit his employment because his employer employs non-union men, they two, having these personal and individual rights, can contract with each other as to what the status of the employment in this particular shall be. The employe on his part may require, as a condition precedent to the sale of his labor, that the employer shall buy it under the terms and upon the conditions prescribed by the labor union, and, moreover, shall employ his other labor upon the same terms. If the employer contracts to do this, he must be held to his contract; for he has accepted the labor upon those conditions. Per contra, the employer may contract with his employe to buy his labor upon terms other than the union ones, and, in order that the union ones may not be disturbing elements in the conduct of his business, may bind his employe not to become a member of the union, and thereby disqualify himself, it may be by reason thereof, from continuing his employment upon the terms and conditions of the contract. These views seem to be clearly established in principle by this Adair Case and the authorities cited therein. With full knowledge that such a contract has been legally consummated between employer and employe, what legal status has the union in the premises? It may regret that its advice, help, and assistance was not sought by the employe in disposing of his labor; but, now that it is disposed of, can it come forward and incite either to break the contract? Its mission, it claims, is to aid and uplift labor; but it could hardly fulfill this mission by persuading men to become breakers of contracts and the repudiators of their lawful promises and pledges, and, if they do, their legitimate functions are prostituted into a conspiracy to destroy others' vested contract rights.

"In Arthur v. Oakes, 63 Fed. 310, 11 C. C. A. 209, 25 L. R. A. 414, it is held:

"'According to the principles of the common law, a conspiracy upon the part of two or more persons, with the intent, by their combined power, to wrong others or to prejudice the rights of the public, is in itself illegal, although nothing be actually done in the execution of such conspiracy. This is fundamental in our jurisprudence. So a combination or conspiracy to procure an employe or body of employes to quit service in violation of the contract of service would be unlawful, and in a proper case might be enjoined, if the injury threatened would be irremediable at law.'

"And the Supreme Court of the United States, in Angle v. C., St. P., M. & O. R. Co., 151 U. S. 1, 14 Sup. Ct. 240, 38 L. Ed. 55, and Bitterman v. L. & N. R. Co., 207 U. S. 205, 28 Sup. Ct. 91, 52 L. Ed. 171, has distinctly set forth this same general principle in cases involving a different state of facts.

"In Transportation Co. v. Oil Co., 50 W. Va. 611, 40 S. E. 591, 56 L. R. A. 804, 88 Am. St. Rep. 895, the Supreme Court of Appeals of this State has held:

"'If one wantonly and maliciously, whether for his own benefit or not, induce a person to violate his contract with a third person, to the injury of that third person, it is actionable.'

"And in Thacker Coal Co. v. Burke, 59 W. Va. 253, 53 S. E. 161, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1091, this doctrine as to contracts generally is reaffirmed and applied to labor contracts. It is there held:

"'One who maliciously entices a servant in actual service of a master to desert and quit his service is liable to action therefor.'

"And again:

"'The act found in Code, 1899, § 14, Append. p. 1053, does not authorize any individual, or number of individuals, to maliciously entice servants to desert service in which they are engaged, or to prevent them from engaging in such service under a contract for such service.'

"These last two cases, recent in date, decided by its court of last resort without dissenting voice, would seem absolutely to settle the law of this matter in this State. But it is insisted that to ask and induce, by reason, argument, and persuasion, plaintiff's employes to join a labor union, is not asking them directly to violate their labor contracts. It is, so far as this organization is concerned. They have not only contracted, as a condition to their employment, that they will not join this particular union; but, if they do join it, they must absolutely quit such employment, because the plaintiff has contracted not to employ members of this union, and this union has on its part, by its laws, solemnly declared that none but its members shall be employed at the mine.

"But, in addition to this question of inducing the violation of lawful contracts, it seems to me very clear that, no matter how meritorious an organization this United Mine Workers of America may be in purpose and intent, the allegations of this bill, if true, and they must be conceded to be so upon the determination of this motion, disclose as plain a conspiracy upon the part of these defendants to injure and ruin the plaintiff as could well be conceived of. They have secured control of this organization. They have bound its members to obey their orders and do their will. Clothed with this power, they have said to plaintiff: 'Notwithstanding you have complied with all the requirements of the organization, have agreed to all its terms and conditions, have employed only union men, have secured near $10,000 to the union's funds in the way of dues from your miners, we propose to stop your operations, require your men to cease working for you, shut down your mine, compel you to violate and lose your contracts, and, in accordance with this purpose to injure, have actually carried out these declarations, have stopped operations, have called out the men, and compelled them, against their will, to cease work, have shut down the mine, and held it in this condition from April 16 to June 12, some 50 working days, at a loss, judging from the output of the mine, that may be estimated from $300 to $700 per day, and with then no promise of let-up before plaintiff's final ruin should be accomplished. What excuse is set up for so foul and injurious prostitution of this organization, claimed to be in existence for philanthropic and lawful purposes, to a conspiracy so glaringly designed to injure and destroy? The sole excuse is alleged to be that some of plaintiff's rival operators refused to comply with the union's demands and exactions! Rival operators, whose actions plaintiff necessarily could not control! Rival operators, who under many conditions might design and scheme to bring about this very condition of things in order to ruin plaintiff and destroy its rivalry! Such an excuse, if it be the only one that can be advanced, adds only insult to injury, and makes more clear and irrefutable the existence of the conspiracy alleged.

"Actuated by a natural sympathy for labor and an earnest desire to uplift and aid it, which we all have, many sincere, but misguided, persons would concede to it an estate superior to and above that possessed by other classes in this republic of liberty and equal rights, and they are fond of denouncing courts of equity for staying the hands of labor leaders in their unlawful exercises of power to achieve this end. We must not forget that we have a Constitution guaranteeing these equal rights, and that courts established thereunder have no discretion in enforcing its guaranties in favor of all those who are denied them and may appeal for redress. As said by Snyder, Judge, in State v. Goodwill, 33 W. Va. 179, 10 S. E. 285, 6 L. R. A. 621, 25 Am. St. Rep. 863:

"'A person living under the protection of this government has the right to adopt and follow any lawful industrial pursuit, not injurious to the community, which he may see fit. And, as incident to this, is the right to labor or employ labor, make contracts in respect thereto upon such terms as may be agreed upon by the parties, to enforce all lawful contracts, to sue, to give evidence, and to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, and convey property of every kind. The enjoyment or deprivation of these rights and privileges constitutes the essential distinction between freedom and slavery—between liberty and oppression. * * * The vocation of an employer, as well as that of his employe, is his property. Depriving the owner of property of one of its attributes is depriving him of his property, under the provisions of the Constitution. People v. Otis, 90 N. Y. 48. The right to use, buy, and sell property, and contract in respect thereto, including contracts for labor—which is, as we have seen, property—is protected by the Constitution.'

"And again:

"'The rights of every individual must stand or fall by the same rule of law that governs every other member of the body politic under similar circumstances.'

"These principles were enunciated in a decision holding unconstitutional a legislative act, passed at the instance of labor organizations, which sought to regulate the method of payment of labor wages. The Adair Case, to which I have referred, held unconstitutional an act of Congress seeking to restrict the right of an employer to discharge his employe because of his membership in a labor organization. These are but two of many cases illustrating how carefully these inalienable property rights have been and must be guarded by the courts, in order that our liberties under constitutional government may be perpetuated.

"It seems clear that under the allegations of this bill a conspiracy has existed between these defendants to injure and destroy the plaintiff's business; that it has already occasioned a damage of many thousand dollars to it, which, it would seem from the authorities we have cited, plaintiff has a clear right to institute its action at law to recover against them, personally and independent of their connection with the labor organization and any relation it, as such, may have to the controversy. The important question now arises whether, this injury being an accomplished fact, there remains any reason for the exercise of the restraining power of equity through the intervention of this injunction. Is this conspiracy a thing of the past, or does it continue at the present time for the same original purpose to injure and destroy? Here the allegations can have no uncertain meaning. It is charged in effect that these defendants, thwarted in their purpose for the time being by the making of the contracts with the employes direct, now are actively seeking with renewed effort to achieve their unlawful purposes; that they have the same control over the labor organization; that its by-laws still require the same exclusion from work at the mines, under its control, of all nonunion labor; that its members are to be bound by the same obligation to cease labor when ordered to do so by these defendants as its officers; that they were, at the time the injunction was granted, actively seeking to persuade plaintiff's employes to break their contracts and become members of this organization, bound by such laws and obligations; that their organizing agent has been sent upon the ground, and has stated, as shown by affidavit filed, that:

"'He had succeeded in having 125 men at the Hitchman mine sign their names, agreeing to become members of the United Mine Workers, and that just as soon as he got 25 more names he was going to shut the Hitchman mine down.'

"Surely these things, if true, negative any idea of abandonment of the conspiracy; and they would, if true, fully justify the charge that plaintiff is in imminent danger of irreparable loss and injury unless equity shall intervene. It would, then, seem that such intervention is necessary for the protection of all parties concerned. The language of the Circuit Court of Appeals (Fourth Circuit) in Atwell v. United States, 162 Fed. 97, 89 C. C. A. 97, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1049, applied there to the court's discretionary power to punish for contempt, may well be here applied to the necessity for it to exercise the injunctive power in a case like this:

"'Very frequently those who complain the loudest against its exercise are ultimately benefited the most. Men, inflamed by passion, are frequently not capable of rightly judging of their own conduct or of foreseeing the consequences thereof. In such cases the restraining power on the part of judges, acting under solemn obligations to do 'equal right to the poor and to the rich' chastened and humbled by the sense of the weighty responsibilities laid upon them, may save such persons from liability to civil and criminal actions, calculated to bring to them ruin and loss of liberty.'

"The motion to modify or dissolve this injunction in any particular must at this time at least be overruled."

From said final decree rendered in favor of this petitioner on January 18, 1913, by said District Court, an appeal was taken to the said Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, and was there argued on February 12, 1914, before Circuit Judges Pritchard, Knapp and Woods, the first named delivering the opinion and judgment of the Court on May 28, 1914, reversing the decree of the Court below, and remanding the cause with instructions to dismiss the bill at plaintiff's costs.

DECISION OF CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS UPON THE SUBJECT OF PLAINTIFF'S CONTRACTS.

"The Court below also reached the conclusion that the defendants have caused and are attempting to cause the nonunion members employed by the plaintiff to break a contract which it has with the nonunion operators. The contract in question is in the following language:

"'I am employed by and work for the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company with the express understanding that I am not a member of the United Mine Workers of America, and will not become so while an employe of the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company; that the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company is run nonunion and agrees with me that it will run nonunion while I am in its employ. If at any time while I am employed by the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company I want to become connected with the United Mine Workers of America, or any affiliated organization, I agree to withdraw from the employment of said company, and agree that while I am in the employ of that company that I will not make any efforts amongst its employes to bring about the unionizing of that mine against the company's wish. I have either read the above or heard the same read.'

"It will be observed that by the terms of the contract that either of the parties thereto may at will terminate the same, and while it is provided that so long as the employe continues to work for the plaintiff he shall not join this organization, nevertheless there is nothing in the contract which requires such employes to work for any fixed or definite period. If at any time after employment any of them should decide to join the defendant organization, the plaintiff could not under the contract recover damages for a breach of the same. In other words, the employes under this contract, if they deem proper may, at any moment join a labor union, and the only penalty provided therefor is that they cannot secure further employment from the plaintiff. Therefore, under this contract, if the nonunion men, or any of them, should see fit to join the United Mine Workers of America on account of lawful and persuasive methods on the part of the defendants, and as a result of such action on their part were to be discharged by the plaintiff, it could not maintain an action against them on account of such conduct on their part. Such being the case, it would be unreasonable to hold that the action of the defendants would render the United Mine Workers of America liable in damages to the plaintiff because they had employed lawful methods to induce the nonunion miners to become members of their organization.

"Under these circumstances, we fail to see how this contract can be taken as a basis for restraining the defendants from using lawful methods for the purpose of inducing the parties to the contract to join the organization."

DECISION OF CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS UPON THE LAWFULNESS OF THE UNITED MINE WORKERS AS AN ORGANIZATION.

"A consideration of the purposes of this organization as set forth in its constitution impels us to the conclusion that there is nothing contained therein to justify the contention that its purposes are unlawful."

DECISION OF CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS UPON THE COMBINATION MADE BY THE UNITED MINE WORKERS WITH OPERATORS OF THE UNIONIZED FIELDS OF OHIO, WESTERN PENNSYLVANIA, INDIANA AND ILLINOIS TO HAVE PLAINTIFF'S AND OTHER WEST VIRGINIA NONUNION MINES UNIONIZED OR PUT OUT OF BUSINESS.

"At the final hearing the plaintiff introduced certain documentary evidence bearing upon the question as to whether the defendants had entered into a combination with operators and coal producers in Ohio, Western Pennsylvania, Illinois and Indiana, competitive fields, to compel the plaintiff to submit to contractual relations with the United Mine Workers of America relating to the employment of labor and production, contrary to the wishes of plaintiff.

"The Court in referring to this phase of the question said:

" 'I further conclude that this Union, in pursuit of its unlawful purposes to secure control and the monopoly of mine labor, and to restrain, suppress, if not destroy, the coal mining industry of West Virginia in the interest of the co-conspirators, rival operators, and producers in Ohio, Western Pennsylvania, Illinois, and Indiana, competitive fields, have sought and still seek to compel the plaintiff, the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company, to submit to contractual relations with it as an organization, relating to the employment of labor and production contrary to the will and wish of said company; that its officers, in pursuance of such unlawful efforts to monopolize labor and restrain trade, and with knowledge of the express contracts existing between this plaintiff and its employes, have unlawfully sought to cause the breach of the said contracts on the part of its said employes.'

"The documentary evidence consisted of the declarations of a small percentage of the miners and operators who were present at these conferences. It was not shown that either before or after these declarations were made that those participating in the conference had entered into a conspiracy for an unlawful purpose. Indeed, these declarations were brought out in response to a proposition on the part of the miners for an increase of wages. A fair interpretation of the evidence shows that it was the purpose of the defendants to induce the miners of West Virginia to become members of the organization, and thereby secure as high wages as possible, compatible with the successful operation of the mines of that State by the respective owners. They had a perfect right to form a combination to accomplish such purposes by peaceable and lawful methods, and so long as they refrained from resorting to unlawful measures to effectuate the same they could not be said to be engaged in a conspiracy to unionize plaintiff's mine."

DECISION OF THE CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS AS TO THE ANTI-TRUST LAW.

"We do not understand that a private person can question the validity of a combination or conspiracy under the Sherman Anti-Trust Law for the purpose of having the same declared to be unlawful."

II.

THE DEFENDANTS DID NOT DEMUR TO THE BILL.

"Objections to proceedings in equity other than an entire absence of matter of equitable cognizance, must be reasonably interposed or they are waived. Sometimes the rule is stated that the existence of an adequate remedy at law is waived by submitting to the jurisdiction or by not seasonably raising the objection (Brown v. Lake Superior Iron Co., 134 U. S. 530; Kilbourn v. Sunderland, 130 U. S. 505). In other cases it is said that the objection is waived if not reasonably interposed, where it is competent for a court of equity to grant the relief sought and it has jurisdiction of the subject matter (Allen v. Pullman's Palace Car Co., 139 U. S. 658)." Cyc. L. and P., Vol. 16, 128.

OBJECTIONS TO JURISDICTION, WHEN AND HOW TAKEN, AT WHAT STAGE OF PROCEEDINGS.

"Unless the matter is wholly beyond the domain of equitable cognizance, no objection to the jurisdiction of equity can be made for the first time on appeal (Wylie v. Coxe, 15 How. 415). Ibid., p. 129. * * * Accordingly, it is said that an answer to the merits submits defendants to the jurisdiction, but more frequently that an answer to the merits without objection to the jurisdiction waives such objection, and in some cases it is expressly held that the objection may be removed by specially presenting it in the answer." Ibid., 132.

"WHERE IN THE COURT BELOW THE DEFENDANT DID NOT DEMUR TO THE COMPLAINT AS ASKING A FORM OF RELIEF INCONSISTENT WITH THE TERM OF THE CONTRACT ALLEGED, BUT WENT TO TRIAL ON THE MERITS, THE OBJECTION THAT THE CASE MADE AND FOUND WAS DIFFERENT FROM THE ONE ALLEGED COMES TOO LATE WHEN URGED FOR THE FIRST TIME IN THE APPELLATE COURT."

NOT DEMURRING, DEFENDANTS ANSWERED.

The Issue Raised.

From the separate answer of A. R. Watkins filed May 26, 1908, this is taken:

> "And this respondent, for further answer unto said bill, says that it is true that the said plaintiff has no contractual relations whatever with any of the defendants to said bill, and that each of said defendants is fully aware that plaintiff is operating a nonunion mine and refuses to consent to operate a union mine; that its men are nonunion; that said employes are required by plaintiff at the time of entering its service to agree not to become connected with the union while employed; and that if they do join the union their said employment shall cease; that with such understanding plaintiff's employes entered its employment, and are now working with plaintiff under such contract and condition, as alleged in said bill, but this respondent avers that any condition, stipulation, contracts or agreements on the part of said plaintiff with its said employes as a condition upon which they shall enter into employment and continue in their employment with plaintiff are contrary to public policy, are in restraint of that freedom of contract accorded to all citizens of the United States under and by virtue of its Constitution and the spirit and purpose of its institutions, and cannot be made a condition upon which to base any valid and binding contract or obligation between employer and employe." Record, pages 92, 93.

The same averment is made in:

Amended answer of A. R. Watkins filed August 20, 1908, Record, pages 150, 155.

And in:

Separate answer of William Green, filed July 13, 1908, Record, pages 118, 123.

And in:

Separate answer of D. H. Sullivan, filed July 13, 1908, Record, pages 133, 138, and 139.

And in the Joint and several answer of T. L. Lewis, et al., filed July 13, 1908, Record, pages 102, 108.

And attention is called to the fact that the separate answer of A. R. Watkins and his amended answer are under oath (Record, pages 101, 165), and that each one of the five answers mentioned is signed by Charles E. Hogg, the same who represents respondents (Record, pages 101, 165, 133, 148, 117).

The bill avers that the acts complained of violate plaintiffs:

(a) Contractual common law rights,

(b) Contractual statutory rights,

(c) Contractual constitutional rights, and besides the allegation of the conclusion of law the facts are alleged and these facts show that plaintiff's charge is correct and that plaintiff's broad constitutional rights are involved and that they are being violated, and the defense made was by way of confession and avoidance.

This Court, however, has held contractual rights similar to those set up in plaintiff's bill to be constitutional rights in these words:

> "When a man is called upon to agree not to become or remain a member of the union while working for a particular employer, he is in effect only asked to deal openly and frankly with his employer, so as not to retain the employment upon terms to which the latter is not willing to agree. And the liberty of making contracts does not include a liberty to procure employment from an unwilling employer, or without a fair understanding. Nor may the employer be foreclosed by legislation from exercising the same freedom of choice that is the right of the employe.

> "To ask a man to agree, in advance, to refrain from affiliation with the union while retaining a certain position of employment, is not to ask him to give up any part of his constitutional freedom. He is free to decline the employment on those terms, just as the employer may decline to offer employment on any other; for 'it takes two to make a bargain.' Having accepted employment on those terms, the man is still free to join the union when the period of employment expires; or, if employed at will, then at any time upon simply quitting the employment. And, if bound by his own agreement to refrain from joining during a stated period of employment, he is in no different situation from that which is necessarily incident to term contracts in general. For constitutional freedom of contract does not mean that a party is to be as free after making a contract as before; he is not free to break it without accountability. Freedom of contract, from the very nature of the thing, can be enjoyed only by being exercised; and each particular exercise of it involves making an engagement which, if fulfilled, prevents for the time any inconsistent course of conduct."
> Coppage v. Kansas, 236 U. S. 1, 20, 21.

and has also held that liability for breaching them may be enforced.

> In a later case this Court said:
>
> "The fact that the employment is at the will of the parties, respectively, does not make it one at the will of others. The employe has manifest interest in the freedom of the employer to exercise his judgment without illegal interference or compulsion and, by the weight of authority, the unjustified interference of third persons is actionable although the employment is at will."

III.

FACTS PROVED.

The existence of the United Mine Workers of America as an organization dates from January, 1890. As a body they were initially made up of several others which had theretofore been warring with each other, and had, of course, been unsuccessful in their special field of endeavor. And the founders had in mind the creation of a body which would be national in character and national in power. In doing this a far-sighted policy was pursued. The organization had its National Constitution, which in later years was changed in name to International owing to the inclusion of mine workers outside of the United States. It had also its District Constitutions and its Sub-District Constitutions. It has those today. The Sub-Districts have their Locals, which are the equivalent of Lodges. In representation these Locals make up a Sub-District Convention. District Conventions are made up of delegates from Locals in the given District. And the National Convention is made up of delegates from the Locals in all the Districts. Certain power is given to each body to legislate. And each body has a President, a Vice-President and a Secretary-Treasurer. National or International matters are disposed of by the National Conventions, District by District Conventions, and Sub-District by Sub-District Conventions. The defense introduced testimony that the organization of the United Mine Workers of America was patterned after the United States Government, and after the State, County and Township governments. And theoretically that seems to some extent to be borne out by an examination of literature of the Union. For it appears that Locals have and exercise all the powers they wish which have not been in express terms delegated to the Sub-Districts, Sub-Districts all not delegated to the Districts, and Districts all not delegated to the National or International Union. But the order is inverse; the analogy not complete. And from this attempt to apply to a labor union governmental principles of a political nature there has grown a National body, the rules and regulations of which, taken together in their International, District, Sub-District and Local features, are a chaotic mass, some lawful and some unlawful, but pregnant with unmeasured and unmeasurable abuse of unlimited and unregulated power.

The United Mine Workers of America are a secret body, and no part, International, District, Sub-District or Local, is incorporated.

Its purposes are made known to mine workers through men who are sent out by the National President as organizers. These organizers may do their work secretly or openly, but in practice they are governed by the rule that the end justifies the means. Upon a Local being organized, one-half or thereabouts of the Charter Fee is paid to the organizer.

Starting with a membership in 1890 of about 20,000 there were less than 10,000 members in 1896. This is said to have been due to the unsuccessful National strike of 1894. The work of organizing was then pushed, and in 1897, with a membership of about 40,000, another National strike was declared. That strike was unsuccessful too, and as a result the membership fell to 32,000 in 1898. It was then that the leaders recognized the futility of their efforts and came to a realization of the fact that unless some other methods were adopted the United Mine Workers of America would dwindle away as had been the case with other labor unions in the mining fields. So they proposed to certain operators in Western Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana and Illinois that a joint meeting between themselves and the United Mine Workers' representatives be held at Chicago to figure out if possible some way whereby, ostensibly, strikes could be avoided. The operators to whom this proposition was made, and by whom it was acted upon, were employers of the bulk of the membership of the United Mine Workers of America. This meeting, upon being held, resulted in what is known as the Chicago Agreement of 1898. By it what is known as the Joint Interstate Movement was established. It was designed to be, and with two interruptions has been, a continuous movement to date. By that agreement the miners secured an eight hour day in the Central Competitive Field and in turn agreed to protect the operators of that field from competition from the non-union fields. What measures were adopted and taken and what are now being used are in evidence. Some of them will be referred to in treating of the activities of the Union.

The bulk of the membership in 1898 resided in Western Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana and Illinois. That is so today. The coal produced in those sections of the United States competed in common markets in the north and west in 1898. That is so today. Therefore, the plan of the United Mine Workers of America to bring about and perpetuate a Joint Interstate Movement in that part of the country between themselves and operators engaged in competition with each other. And the name Central Competitive Field referred to those states as well as to their geographical location within the United States. That is so today.

While the Chicago Agreement of 1898 brought the eight hour day to the Union, in return for which the Union agreed to protect the operators of the Central Competitive Field from competition from the non-union fields, the eight hour day was not all the Union got by any means. By the 5th Clause of the Chicago Agreement of 1898 it was provided > "That on and after April 1, 1898, the eight hour work day with eight hours' pay, consisting of six days per week shall be in effect in all of the districts represented, and that uniform wages for day labor shall be paid the different classes of labor in the fields named, and that internal differences in any of the states or districts, both as to prices or conditions, shall be referred to the States or districts affected for adjustment."

Pursuant to the comprehensively suggestive terms of that clause of the agreement, and of a resolution passed for the purpose by the Scale Committee of the Interstate Convention held at Chicago which resulted in the making of the Chicago Agreement of 1898, a Joint Interstate Convention was held at Columbus in March, 1898, for the making of a uniform day work scale based upon the districts upon which the mining prices were based. This latter Convention evolved what is known as the Columbus Day Wage Scale. It established an inside day wage scale for an eight hour day, but failed to establish any wage scale for outside day labor. Of the inside day wage scale the Columbus Agreement says:

> "The above scale was arrived at by taking the average of the wages paid in all the competitive districts, and reducing said average to an eight hour day, then adding the advance to said average to correspond with the advance in price of mining to be paid April 1 next."

Regarding the failure to make a scale for outside day labor, that Convention passed a resolution reading as follows:

> "Whereas, We have failed to agree upon a uniform rate of wages for the different classes of outside labor for the entire competitive field owing to the variation of conditions over which we have no control:

"Resolved, That the employing of outside day laborers around the mine, and wages to be paid the same, shall be left entirely to the employers and such employes in all the competitive districts, and the question of uniform wages for outside labor be referred to our next Interstate Joint Convention.

"Resolved, That where any members of the present force of outside day labor in the competitive field prefer to work in the mine in preference to accepting the wages offered for their services as outside day laborers, they shall be given places in the mine to mine coal."

Subsequently, a wage scale for outside day labor was agreed upon. And through this Joint Movement the wages of all men who work in and around the mines in Union territory are now fixed. The prices are competitive having regard not to the earning power of the men but to the competition existing between the operators participating in the Joint Movement, and to the competition those same operators encounter from coal from the non-union fields.

By the 5th Clause of the Chicago Agreement of 1898, the United Mine Workers of America succeeded in establishing the check-off system and the closed shop. Both of these are prominent features of the Union.

By the check-off the operators are made the collection agents of the Union, and compelled to collect from their employes and pay to the Union's officials what the Union demands from its members who are in the employ of the operators. The experience of the leaders of the United Mine Workers had shown them that their members were slow and uncertain pay. Hence the check-off system was devised. And with what wisdom it was devised and is still adhered to is shown by a consideration of the fact that these officials received in 1910 from the operators dealing with them more than $1,500,000.00.

By the closed shop concession the Union has succeeded in so intrenching itself that it has closed shop wage agreements covering all the men employed in and around all the mines in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Iowa, Kansas, Missouri, Oklahoma, Texas, Arkansas, part of Kentucky, part of British Columbia, part of Washington, all of Wyoming and Montana, Northern Colorado until some recent trouble there, part of Central Pennsylvania and the greater part of Western Pennsylvania.

The operators who participated in the establishment of the Joint Interstate Movement evidently thought they would receive enough benefit from the suppression of competition from the non-union fields to warrant them conceding the check-off and the closed shop. But reports of the later Joint Interstate Conventions are filled with bitter reproaches. And although the United Mine Workers as an organization have to date waged an industrial war against the non-union fields the Union operators still complain of the competition from those fields and urge the Mine Workers to greater efforts along the same line, and to other and more desperate and unlawful acts.

In sharp contrast to the manifest disposition of the Union operators to get from under the jurisdiction of the United Mine Workers is the attitude of the Union's officials. These know and assert their power and say to the operators of mines in unionized territory that those mines must be run Union, or not at all. And being confronted with a United Mine Worker membership of more than 300,000, but now at the time of the preparation of this statement, although, of course, outside of the record, claimed to be more than 400,000, and with an income of more than $1,500,000.00 per annum, the operators must perforce and do submit.

Following the granting of the check-off the Union had plenty of money to employ organizers. And the power of organizers was increased by the granting of the closed shop wage agreement. Membership increased from 32,000 in 1898 to 61,000 in 1899, from 61,000 in 1899 to 115,000 in 1900 and from 115,000 in 1900 to 198,000 in 1901. And then came the 1902 Anthracite Strike, and a reduction of membership to 175,000. Following the settlement of that strike which was waged to compel recognition of the Union, the work of the organizers was resumed. Membership increased from 175,000 in 1902, to 247,000 in 1903, from 247,000 in 1903 to 251,000 in 1904 and from 251,000 in 1904 to 264,000 in 1905. In 1906 a National strike was called, and membership dropped to 230,000. The 1906 strike was a disastrous one for the Union, but upon its settlement and funds coming to hand again from the check-off paid in by the operators in Union territory, the work of organizers was again resumed. Since then the work of organizing all the coal mines in the country has progressed to such a degree that in December, 1910, the Union had over 300,000 members, while the organization claims that it now has over 400,000 members and that there are now over 350,000 miners in the United States who are not members of that organization.

In this recital of this part of the history of the United Mine Workers of America, we have not sought to mention all the National strikes, and no mention has been made of the other innumerable strikes the organization has been concerned in.

Some idea of the warring proclivities of the Union may be derived from a consideration of the fact that from 1900 to 1910, both years inclusive, the National organization paid out of its own treasury more than $8,000,000.00 in support of strikes. The United Mine Workers spent more than $1,250,000.00 in Alabama for strike purposes and were finally run out of that State; nearly $1,500,000.00 for the same purpose in the Anthracite fields; $329,000.00 for the same purpose in the Irwin Field in Pennsylvania; and $669,000.00 for a like purpose in West Virginia, and with the result that in West Virginia their officials claim they are run out of the State, or their lives endangered if they stay, after being discovered.

Such is a part of the history of the United Mine Workers of America; and it is of their own making.

We will ask attention next to some of their principles, methods of procedure, and practices.

The Constitution of the International Union contains this clause:

"ARTICLE I.

"SECTION 2. The objects of this Union are to unite mine employes that produce or handle coal or coke in or around the mines, and ameliorate their condition by methods of conciliation, arbitration or strikes."

The Constitution of District No. 6 contains this clause:

"ARTICLE I.

"SEC. 2. One of the objects of this organization is to unite all employes in and around the coal mines of Ohio and the Panhandle District of West Virginia."

The Constitution of Sub-District 5 of District No. 6 contains these two clauses:

"ARTICLE I.

"SEC 2. The objects of this organization is to unite the mine employes of Belmont, Jefferson, Tuscarawas, Harrison and Carrol Counties in Ohio, and that part of Stark County south of Canton, other than the Massillon Seam, and Hancock, Brooke, Ohio and Marshall Counties of West Virginia, to ameliorate their conditions by methods of conciliation, arbitration or strike."

"ARTICLE I.

"SEC. 3. All men are eligible and must be members of the U. M. W. of A. who work in and around the mines."

In connection with this design, evidenced by their Constitutional provisions, to control all labor employed in and around the coal mines of the country, the organization in its recent National Conventions has taken steps to bring about the solidification of its forces with the forces of the Western Federation of Miners, and the including of both of their organizations in a new department of the American Federation of Labor to be known as the Mining Department. The language of that part of the Resolutions relating to the Western Federation of Miners and that particular feature is as follows:

> "We declare in favor of forming a mining department under the jurisdiction of the American Federation of Labor to control the mining industry of the American Continent, along similar lines to those departments which are now organized under the jurisdiction of the American Federation of Labor."

The United Mine Workers of America and the Western Federation of Miners have an agreement for the mutual exchange of membership transfer cards, and both unions are integral parts of the American Federation of Labor. The purpose of the American Federation of Labor as an integral whole is to bring all the International and National organizations of labor in this country into one family or federation of unions, and at the same time not to take away from the International and National unions the power and authority to regulate their own affairs.

Some of the rules and conditions enforced by the United Mine Workers of America are:

Men shall not work on idle days without permission of the Union, but if allowed to work, such work must be evenly distributed amongst the mine's employes.

If railroad cars in which coal for shipment is to be loaded are not at the mine within thirty minutes after starting time the miners are to go home and not work that day.

If an operator shall so manage his business that four of his employes are out of cutting or drilling when work time comes in the morning, the mine committee may shut the mine down for the next day.

Sons of members of the United Mine Workers are to be given the preference of going into the mines when becoming of proper age.

Each two men shall have two working places in the mine, and the operator shall not employ more men until each two men have two working places.

The turn shall be uniform throughout the mine, in entry driving as well as mining coal in rooms.

Members of the mine committee are not to be required to stay at their working places in the mine if while away they are looking after the interests of the Union.

The men upon going to work in the mine are to be paid for two hours' work whether the mine runs two hours or not.

There shall be but one loader in each entry.

If the miner fails to produce clean coal the operator may close down his mine, but may not discharge the miner.

A miner may not be transferred from his working place inside the mine to a working place outside the mine unless he consents and unless in addition he is paid inside scale wages for outside work.

Where one company operates more than one mine on the same line of railroad in the same vein of coal the work between the respective mines shall be divided and made as nearly equal as business conditions will permit.

If for any grievance, real or supposed, any of the workmen shut down the mine each employe shall pay the company one dollar per day during such shut down; and if because of any grievance with any employe, real or supposed, the company shuts down its mine, it shall pay one dollar per day to each workman in and around the mine during such shut down.

Officers of the United Mine Workers may close down mines whenever they deem it to be for the best interests of the Union.

When officers of the United Mine Workers of America close down a mine, they may, if they deem it wise, close every other mine in the District, or they may distribute the men from the mine which they have closed down into any other mine or mines in the same District.

A method of procedure in the matter of Joint Interstate agreements is that whatever is agreed to is subject to either the previous or the subsequent ratification of the entire organization of United Mine Workers. The officials of that body have repeatedly tried to compel the operators who meet them in Joint Convention to admit the miners from other sections of the country who have, as those operators claim, no interest whatever in the result to be arrived at by the particular Joint Convention. And in reply to that objection it appears from the evidence that the Union's officials contemplate enforcing whatever agreement is arrived at regardless of the fact that particular operators or miners are not parties to the Joint Convention which may have agreed to the particular scale.

Some of the practices of the United Mine Workers of America are, by their officials, to drive operators out of business who incur their displeasure. This is done by means of strikes, called or induced by them, so that the operator is no longer able to operate his mine. Other things indulged in by the United Mine Workers are:

They have sent out men to the trade to boycott West Virginia coal.

They aim to have all wage agreements expire on the same date, both in the Anthracite and in the Bituminous Fields, and then by strike or by cessation of work throughout the entire United States compel compliance with their demands.

They engage in politics and maintain lobbies for the purpose of affecting legislation.

They put operators at a disadvantage who refuse to go into the Joint Interstate Movement.

They compelled operators in the Southwest territory to join the operators' association by refusing to allow their members to work for operators who did not join that operators' association upon that association agreeing not to employ any man who was not a member of the United Mine Workers of America.

They have constantly aimed to involve West Virginia and other non-union fields in local or National strikes; and that is their aim today.

Through their President, the defendant Mitchell, they threatened to stop every mine in the Pittsburgh district by filling them with organizers, if necessary, in order to compel compliance with their wishes. Mitchell boasted of this.

They recognize that organizing the mine workers of the non-union fields is the all important problem which confronts their Union, and they are constantly aiming to increase the cost of the West Virginia operators' coal through organizers and secret agents sent out to stir up strife.

We come now to a consideration of the relations which once subsisted between the United Mine Workers of America and the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company.

The Hitchman Coal & Coke Company opened and at first in 1903 operated its mine non-union. At the same time in 1903 the same persons owning the capital stock of the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company, together with some other persons not owners of any of the capital stock of the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company opened and operated a Union mine at Mount Pleasant, Ohio. Sometime prior to April 1, 1903, the United Mine Workers secretly placed organizers in the Hitchman mine. These men worked as miners. When these organizers had worked up a sentiment amongst the Hitchman miners in favor of joining the Union, the officials of the United Mine Workers notified the management of the Hitchman mine that unless the Hitchman mine was run Union they would close down the Mount Pleasant mine. Being confronted with that alternative, the management of the Hitchman mine agreed that if their employes wanted to join the Union no objection would be interposed provided the Union was run right. An official of the Union then formally organized the men into a Local of the United Mine Workers. The organizers disappeared, and the next day after the local was organized the men were called out on a strike. This was on April 2, 1903, and the men remained out until May 23, 1903. The occasion of the strike was that the Union's officials claimed that the Hitchman mine was not paying scale price on run of mine coal. The United Mine Workers then had a rule that the price for mine run should be five-sevenths of the price of screened coal based upon the Hocking Valley. That scale even in Ohio was then a dead letter. Run of mine coal in Ohio was then in practice paid for on the screened coal basis. The coal was mined and screened, and so paid for, and, if sold run of mine, was then all put together again. At the Hitchman mine, the railroad engine fuel was then and is now run of mine. When the Local was organized in 1903 the Coal Company was paying what it considered the proportionate price for run of mine coal based upon the screened coal price for the kind of coal at that mine, but paid for by the car. And when the strike was called to enforce the Hocking Valley price of five-sevenths the price of screened coal, the Hitchman management stated that such price was prohibitive, but agreed to permit a test to be made at which the Union's officials should be present to determine the true ratio between screened coal and slack at that mine. The Union's officials declined to do this until May 23, 1903, during which time the mine was kept idle, and the men not allowed to go to work. On May 23, 1903, the mine resumed work under an agreement that a two weeks' test be made. A test was made for a few days by the Union's officials and then abandoned by them. They then settled with the Company on a price which was much less than the scale price for which the strike was called. The agreed price accepted as correct by these officials as the result of this test was about one cent and a half per ton more than the Company had been paying for run of mine coal paid for by the car prior to the men joining the Union. And that basis so established by that test has, ever since it was made, been the basis upon which the Company has paid its men for run of mine coal. That strike cost the Company $7,242.00.

On April 20, 1904, the Union's officials again called the Company's men out on strike. This time it was about the run of mine coal. They were not satisfied with the 1903 settlement and wanted to try what they called the average as distinguished from the tonnage basis. They kept the men out and the mine idle until June 15, 1904. When work was resumed it was on the average basis. This strike cost the Company $17,000.00.

When April 1, 1905, came the officials of the Union insisted on returning to the tonnage method on the basis of the 1903 run of mine settlement, as the men claimed they made more money under that than they did on the average basis. The Company then readopted the 1903 tonnage basis.

As the time approached for the National strike which was called for April 1, 1906, the Company's management tried to arrange with the Union's officials to have the men continue at work and to take care of the engine fuel trade. The Company offered to pay the 1903 scale, for which the Union's officials contended as the result of a modification of the demands of the United Mine Workers of America resultant upon the holding of the second 1906 Joint Interstate Convention between the miners and operators of the Central Competitive States. The Union's officials agreed to let the men employed at the Hitchman mine work under those conditions provided the Company did not mine any commercial coal and only took care of the railroad engine trade. BUT THIS PERMISSION WAS WITHDRAWN AFTERWARDS AND THE MEN WERE ORDERED TO QUIT WORK AND DID QUIT WORK ON APRIL 16, 1906. The men were out and the mine was idle until June 12, 1906. Before quitting work on April 16, 1906, the men employed at the mine tried to get permission from their officials to continue work loading engine coal, and explained that unless they were allowed to do so the B. & O. Railroad Company would haul in non-union coal and have it loaded into their engines from the Hitchman Company's tipple and bins. And in addition to that the Company's management notified these Union officials that if they called the men out on strike the mine would not be run Union again.

While the Hitchman mine was still being kept idle, these same officials, through the defendant Sullivan, effected a settlement with the Lorain Coal & Dock Company, and coal was shipped from the Wheeling Creek mine near Bridgeport, Ohio, to the Hitchman Mine and loaded over that Company's tipple and from that Company's bins into engines of the B. & O. R. R. Co. It was part of the Railroad Company's contract with the Hitchman Company that in case of strikes at the Hitchman mine, the Hitchman Company would load over its tipple and from its bins into the B. & O. engines such coal as the B. & O. R. R. Co. might furnish for that purpose. This coal came from the same mine that the defendant Lewis worked at, when working in the mine, at his home in Bridgeport, Ohio. In addition to that, the Lorain Coal & Dock Company was a party to and represented by the same person at the Joint Interstate Conventions held in 1906, 1908 and 1910 between the operators and miners of the States of the Central and Competitive Field, that the defendant Sullivan settled the strike with.

The Hitchman Coal & Coke Company was not a member of any operators' association and was not a party to any of these Joint Interstate Conventions.

The settlement of this strike so far as the Lorain Coal & Dock Company was concerned was made by the defendant Sullivan between May 16, 1906, and May 20, 1906, and on May 22, 1906, B. & O. Railroad cars were found at the Hitchman mine loaded with coal from the Wheeling Creek mine which was taken up over the tipple and loaded into engines of the B. & O. Railroad Company from the bins of the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company. The National strike of 1906 was not really settled in Sub-District 5 of District 6 until at a Joint Convention of miners and operators which was held at Wheeling, July 24th, 25th, 26th and 27th, 1906, when a settlement was effected on the basis of the 1903 scale.

During the period of time the Hitchman mine had been run Union, that is from April, 1903, to April, 1906, the Company paid nearly $10,000.00 to the Union's officials as check-off.

When the strike of 1906 came the men expected to receive benefits. They were not paid the benefits they were entitled to, and this fact coupled with the knowledge that Union coal was being loaded into the B. & O. engines over the Hitchman Coal Company's tipple and from its bins, which was mined at the Wheeling Creek mine of the Lorain Coal & Dock Company, at Bridgeport, Ohio, Lewis's home, made them discontented and indignant. They resented the fact that their Union officials would allow the Lorain Coal & Dock Company's mines to operate and yet would not let the Hitchman mine run when its management had offered to pay the 1903 scale, the very scale the Union was contending for.

The 1906 strike cost the Hitchman Company $24,500.00, and together with $17,000.00 in 1904 and $7,242.00 in 1903, made a loss of $48,742.00 in the three years the mine was operated Union.

By June 12, 1906, the Union men who had struck under orders April 16, 1906, came to an agreement of their own with the management of the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company, and the mine resumed work non-union. It has been run so ever since, and is running so today. And it is noteworthy that from the time the mine was opened up non-union in 1902 to April 1, 1903, when the mine started to run Union, there had been no strike of any kind, and that from June 12, 1906, to this date, or for more than the last ten years the mine has not lost a single day on account of labor trouble, and that all it has been threatened with has been that caused by the United Mine Workers of America in their efforts to reunionize plaintiff's men and mine and to re-assert their sway.

About the time, or shortly after the men started to work non-union at the Hitchman mine, the officials of the United Mine Workers of America came after and got the Charter they had issued to the Local when it was organized in 1903, and also got the seal. They wanted the money the Local had, but this was refused them, and they were told that the men at the Hitchman mine had paid the money into the Local treasury and that they were going to use it to get out a State Charter for an independent mine workers' organization. This plan was consummated and the record shows that on June 25, 1906, a Charter was issued by the Secretary of State of the State of West Virginia to the Independent Mine Workers of West Virginia.

The evidence establishes that beginning with June 12, 1906, the Company and its men entered into contracts whereby the men were to work non-union and the mine was to be run non-union, and that on this subject a memorandum employment card put into use in the Company's office on January 1, 1908, and used ever since and in use now is a correct statement of the verbal agreement of employment entered into when the mine resumed work non-union June 12, 1906. The memorandum card is as follows:

> "I am employed by and work for the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company with the express understanding that I am not a member of the United Mine Workers of America and will not become so while an employe of the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company; that the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company is run non-union and agrees with me that it will run non-union while I am in its employ. If at any time while I am employed by the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company I want to become connected with the United Mine Workers of America, or any affiliated organization, I agree to withdraw from the employment of said Company, and agree that while I am in the employ of that Company that I will not make any efforts amongst its employes to bring about the unionizing of that mine against the Company's wish. I have either read the above, or heard the same read."

In this connection, plaintiff filed a list of 579 names of its employes who beginning with January 1, 1908, and down to March 8, 1911, had signed such cards, and submitted the cards themselves for verification. These cards still remain in the custody of the Clerk of the Court.

When the United Mine Workers of America held their National Convention in January, 1907, at Indianapolis, Indiana, they were confronted with a decreased membership, depleted funds and an interruption in the Joint Interstate Movement. They promptly, by Convention action, took steps to recover the lost ground. And the minutes of their proceedings show that they passed a resolution approving the enforced action of their officers in having largely withdrawn the organizing forces because of want of funds, but at the same time directed that work to be resumed as soon as the state of the Union's finances would warrant it. That Convention also instructed the International officers to negotiate with the operators of the Central Competitive Field for an interstate meeting to be held sometime prior to the time of expiration of the contracts the Union then had, and a suitable length of time prior to April 1, 1908. These officers were also instructed to make a reasonable effort to secure the admission of all soft coal producing states desiring admission to the Joint Interstate Movement.

After months of work on the part of the Union, the 1908 Joint Interstate Convention was arranged for and subsequently held, but the operators from Illinois refused to participate. The miners from Illinois demanded admittance to that Convention, but were not admitted owing to the refusal of the operators from Western Pennsylvania, Ohio and Indiana to allow that unless the operators of Illinois could be induced to return. And it was then announced by the Union's officials that whatever agreement might be entered into at that Convention would have to be ratified by vote of the entire membership of the United Mine Workers. And the record shows that subsequently by a referendum vote of the entire membership of the United Mine Workers the two year contract negotiated at the 1908 Joint Interstate Convention was approved. And in addition an adjournment of that Convention was had until the first Tuesday in February, 1910, at 10 o'clock A. M., in the City of Toledo, Ohio. It was declared by that Convention that the Illinois operators and miners should be a part of the Central Competitive Joint Movement, and they were urged to become part of it, and to join in what was then the next Joint Interstate Convention to be held in February, 1910.

Having seen that the National Convention of the United Mine Workers held in 1907 took steps to bring about the holding of a Joint Interstate Convention in 1908, for the same Central Competitive States, and also took steps to proceed with the organization of the non-union fields in accordance with previous plans to suppress the competition the operators of the States composing the Central Competitive Field had been so long complaining of let us now see what really was next done on that line. And at this point we will ask the Court's attention to the effect of this general attempt at organizing all non-union fields as it was applied to the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company.

When the Annual Convention of the United Mine Workers of Sub-District 5 of District No. 6 was held at Wheeling in March, 1907, the defendant Rankin made a report as Secretary-Treasurer, in which he said:

"We have one mine at Bellaire, O., and five mines in the Panhandle District which I believe should be organized. I believe those mines can be organized, and in my opinion this Convention should adopt some plan to organize those mines."

The evidence shows that he referred to the Hitchman mine, the Glendale and the Richland, amongst the five.

The Convention then passed the following resolution:

"RESOLUTION NO. 8.

"Whereas, There are mines in the Panhandle District and Ohio that are not organized, and believing every mine should be organized, be it

"Resolved, By this Ninth Annual Convention, that the Sub-District officers together with the District officers, be authorized to take up the work of organizing every mine in the Sub-District as quickly as it can be done."

The evidence also shows that the Hitchman mine, the Glendale and the Richland were amongst those intended to be affected by Resolution No. 8.

Pursuant to that action, the officers of District No. 6 and of Sub-District 5 of District No. 6 took up the question of organizing the non-union mines in the Panhandle District, and some of these defendants as such officers visited the management of the Hitchman mine and held a conference at the office of the mine at the mine.

And other conferences were subsequently had in Wheeling. These officials stated plainly that they wanted to organize the men and mine again, and resume their former contract relations with the Hitchman Company. The management of the mine declined to entertain the suggestion and reminded them of the warning given prior to the time the men were called out on strike April 16, 1910, that the mine would not be run Union again if that strike was called. The officials finally asked that the question of reunionizing be submitted to the Company's Board of Directors. That was done; the Board of Directors refused to have anything whatever to do with the Union and these officials, and this action was promptly made known to them. These dealings ran along into the summer of 1907, and as a result reports were put in circulation by the Union's officials that the mine was going to be unionized, and that unless the men joined the United Mine Workers they would soon be out of their jobs.

The evidence also shows that each year during the time intervening between the opening of lake navigation, usually about December first, coal is shipped from West Virginia, Pennsylvania and Ohio to Lake ports for reshipment by vessel to points in the North and West, from which points it is then distributed to the trade and to consumers generally. During this period of time operators make every effort to increase their working force of miners so as to take care of what lake trade they can get. It is also in evidence that the Hitchman Company had a large lake tonnage contracted for in the summer and fall of 1907, and that the defendants were aware of that. And so with that information they sought to cripple that mine by circulating reports that the mine was to be unionized. This deterred many miners from taking employment and also deterred the management of the Hitchman Company from hiring men indiscriminately for fear of the mine being filled with organizers.

The same persons who were the owners of the capital stock of the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company were the owners of another mine adjoining the property of the Hitchman Company. That mine was called the Glendale mine. It is so called and so owned now. The operation of that mine is managed from the office of the Hitchman Company by the same persons who manage the Hitchman mine. It was so in 1907.

Early in September, 1907, the defendant Thomas Hughes was sent by the officials of the United Mine Workers into the Panhandle District of West Virginia with instructions to organize the non-union mines, and compel them to recognize the Union or else be shut down. He visited the Hitchman mine, the Glendale and the Richland. As a result of his work, he succeeded in organizing the men at the Richland mine, and when the operator controlling that mine refused to recognize the Union, Hughes shut the mine down. At the Glendale mine, Hughes succeeded in having twenty-two men join the Union and quit work. The loss of twenty-two men crippled that mine, but it still continued to operate non-union. At the Hitchman mine, Hughes, according to his statements, succeeded in having enough men agree to join the Union to enable him to unionize the mine, and he was about ready to shut it down, which he also stated he would do, if the management did not recognize the Union.

In the direct examination of J. C. McKinley (Record, pp. 414-415) the following occurs:

> "Q. Have you any recollection of having any conversation with Mr. Rankin, one of the defendants, upon the subject of unionizing the mines in the northern Panhandle District?
>
> "A. I have.
>
> "Q. State what that conversation was, as nearly as you now recall?
>
> "A. My recollection is that just after the Sub-District convention adjourned I met Mr. Rankin on the street and knowing him very well I entered into conversation with him. During that conversation I said to him, 'Well, what did you all do?' 'Well,' he said, 'there is one thing we did, and that was to arrange to organize the Panhandle district of West Virginia.' 'Well,' I said, 'Why don't you let us alone?' and he replied, 'That was brought up in the convention and a resolution was passed directing us to organize the Panhandle'; and he said further,

'We will be over to see you right away,' or something to that effect.

"Q. In 'Plaintiff's Documentary Exhibit No. 5,' which purports to be the proceedings of the Ninth Annual Convention Sub-District 5, District 6, held at Wheeling March 14, 15, 16, 18 and 19, 1907, I find on page 28 this resolution:

"RESOLUTION NO. 8.

"Whereas, there are miners in the Panhandle District and Ohio that are not organized, and believing every mine should be organized; be it

"'Resolved, by this ninth annual convention that the sub-district officers together with the district officers, be authorized to take up the work of organizing every mine in the sub-district as quickly as it can be done.'

"Q. (continued). Was that the resolution referred to in your talk with Mr. Rankin?

"A. I suppose so. He did not tell me the number of the resolution but that is the gist of it.

"Q. Now, what happened after that talk with Rankin with reference to the attempted unionizing of the northern Panhandle District of West Virginia, as nearly as you now recollect?

"A. My recollection is that we did not hear anything about it for two or three months, and I thought they had given up the attempt until along about the middle of the summer they commenced to come in to see me, and mentioned the fact at different times when I saw them that they were going to organize us, and then afterwards I found that they were sending organizers about our mines, as well as other mines in the Panhandle District, and they told me what they were doing at other mines. They neglected to say, however, just what progress they were making at our own mine, except that they were going to get us sooner or later.

"Q. And if they got the men and didn't get you, what would happen with your mine, did they say?

"A. Oh, they said they would shut us down and compel us to recognize the union.

"Q. Did they say anything on that line with reference to the other mines in the northern Panhandle District that were running nonunion?

"A. Yes, sir; they stated specific mines that they were going to organize.

"Q. What mines were they?

"A. The Glendale, Hitchman, Richland—which was ours—and the Beech Bottom mine.

"Q. Do you know from them what progress they made at the Glendale mine?

"A. Yes, sir; they told me that they had twenty some men (I think it was twenty-four) who had joined the organization, and that they had sixty men who had signed up or had agreed to join the organization at Hitchman, and that they were going to shut the mine down as soon as they got a few more men.

"Q. The Hitchman mine?

"A. Yes, sir; and all of the mines in the Panhandle District would have to recognize the union or remain closed.

"Q. You say they did not tell you what progress they were making at the Richland mine?

"A. They did not.

"Q. What was your experience that disclosed what progress they were making at that mine?

"A. Our first experience that showed us the progress they had made was when they succeeded in shutting us down, which was about the middle of October, 1907.

"Q. And after the mine was shut down did it resume union, or did it stay shut down, or did it resume non-union again?

"A. It staid shut down until a restraining order was allowed by the court, immediately after which it resumed non-union and has been so operated since.

"Q. You have had no labor troubles since?

"A. No; we have not."

At this stage of the proceeding, the Hitchman Company, the Glendale Company and the Richland Company applied to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of West Virginia for injunctive relief. And a similar restraining order was issued in each one of the three cases.

At the Hitchman mine so great had been the disturbance created by the attempt to organize the men there that with the number the Company could safely employ it was unable to fulfill its contracts for delivery of coal for the lake trade from its mine, and from ten to fifteen thousand tons of coal had to be bought elsewhere.

IV.

FREEDOM OF CONTRACT AS GUARANTEED BY ENGLISH LAW AGAINST INTERFERENCE FROM LABOR UNIONS.

The basic principle is the doctrine of Lumley v. Gye.

Lumley was the lessee and manager of the Queen's Theater in London, and he contracted with Johanna Wagner to perform in his theater for a certain time, with a condition, amongst others, that she should not sing nor use her talents elsewhere during the term without plaintiff's consent in writing; yet the defendant knowing of this, and while the agreement was in force and before the expiration of the term enticed and procured Wagner to refuse to perform; by means of which enticement and procurement, Wagner wrongfully refused to perform and did not perform during the term.

The above constitutes the substance of the first two counts of the declaration. The third count differs from the first two, in that it sets out that Wagner was really performing in the theater for reward to her, and that the defendant had maliciously procured her to depart out of plaintiff's employment, whereby she did depart out of the employment and service of plaintiff, whereby damage was suffered by the plaintiff.

Each count in the declaration alleged special damage. There was a demurrer and joinder. The Court in Lumley v. Gye laid down this rule:

"Where there is a contract between two persons for exclusive personal service to be rendered by the one to the other, an action lies against a third person (not a party to the contract), who intentionally induces the former party to break his contract so as to cause, as the natural consequence of the breach, loss to the other."

An effort was made in Lumley v. Gye to show that the proposition laid down by the Court would not apply, because it was claimed that the relation of master and servant in the strict sense did not exist between plaintiff and Wagner, and that the law as to enticing servants was contrary to the general rule and principle of law, and anomalous, and probably had its origin from the state of society when serfdom existed, and was founded upon, or upon the equity of, the Statute of Laborers.

The Court rejected that contention, and announced the rule above stated.

Lumley v. Gye (1853). 2 E. & B. 216. 1 E. R. C. 706, Subscription Edition May, 1905.

Simpson's Cases on Torts, 1908, p. 329.

Bowen carried on the business of brickmaker, near Stourbridge, England. He made a contract with one of the defendants, Pearson by name, under which Pearson agreed and undertook, for the consideration of certain prices named in the contract, to find all labor for the whole manufacture in a workman-like manner, of best quality white-glazed bricks and baths (with exception of hooping the baths and preparing the clay mass) in such quantities as Bowen might require, and when Bowen might require, and to deliver anywhere they might be required on plaintiff's premises, the quality to be equal to sample supplied, and the prices to be subject to the standard prices of the trade for the manufacture of the same.

The contract contains a somewhat extended scale, covering the different articles of manufacture.

Pearson agreed not to engage himself to any one else for a term of five years, and Bowen, on his part, agreed not to engage any one else for the same work for a term of five years.

It will be noticed that the contract for five years on the part of Pearson and Bowen was negative in each instance.

Pearson did not agree to work for Bowen for five years. He only agreed not to work for any one else for a term of five years. Bowen did not agree to employ Pearson for five years. He only agreed that he would not engage any one else for the same work for a term of five years. The contract bore date June 18, 1877, and in May, 1878, the defendants, Hall and Fletcher, Fletcher being Hall's manager, wrongfully induced Pearson, contrary to his agreement with plaintiff, to depart from the exclusive service of plaintiff, and to manufacture on account of the defendant Hall glazed bricks and baths such as he had contracted to manufacture for the plaintiff.

Plaintiff sued Hall and Fletcher for damages, and claimed an injunction to restrain them from employing Pearson, and also claimed an injunction to restrain Pearson from engaging himself to Hall and Fletcher until the expiration of his contract of service with plaintiff.

It was held that the doctrine announced in Lumley v. Gye, supra, applied, and that an action would lie against the defendants, Hall and Fletcher, for wrongfully enticing away and keeping the other defendant, Pearson, from plaintiff's employment, and for wrongfully receiving and harboring him after notice of his being the servant of the plaintiff, and as against the said defendant Pearson for unlawfully and against the will of the plaintiff departing from the service of the plaintiff.

The Court was of the opinion that the act of the defendants was done with knowledge of the contract between the plaintiff and Pearson; was done in order to obtain an advantage for one of the defendants at the expense of the plaintiff; was done from a wrong motive, and would, therefore, justify a finding that it was done in that sense maliciously.

Bowen v. Hall (1891). 6 Q. B. D. 333. (s. c. 50 L. J. Q. B. 305). 1 E. R. C. 717, Id. ed.

The defendants were members of a joint committee of three trade unions connected with the building trade in Hull. A firm of builders there having refused to obey certain rules laid down by the unions with regard to building operations, the unions sought to compel them to do so, by preventing the supply of building materials to them. In pursuance of this object, they requested the plaintiff, a master mason and builder in Hull, who supplied building materials to the firm, to cease to supply them with such materials, but the plaintiff refused to do so. Thereupon, with the object of injuring the plaintiff in his business, in order to compel him to comply with such request, the defendants induced persons who, to the knowledge of the defendants, had entered into contracts with the plaintiff for the supply of materials, to break their contracts, and not to enter into further contracts with the plaintiff, by threatening that the workmen would be withdrawn from their employ. The plaintiff sustained damage in consequence of such breaches of contract, and of the refusal of such persons to enter into contracts with him: Held, that an action was maintainable by the plaintiff against the defendants for maliciously procuring such breaches of contract, and also for maliciously conspiring together to injure him by preventing persons from entering into contracts with him.

The right of action for maliciously procuring a breach of contract is not confined to contracts in the nature of contracts of personal service.

Lopes, L. J., said:

> "I presume that the principle is this, viz: that the contract confers certain rights on the person with whom it is made and not only binds the parties to it by the obligation entered into but also imposes on all the world the duty of respecting that contractual obligation."
> Temperton v. Russell, 1 Q. B. (1893) 715, 730.

The action in Quinn v. Leathem was originally brought in the High Court in Ireland by Leathem, the respondent, as plaintiff, against Quinn and four other persons, to recover damages for a wrongful interference with the plaintiff's business of a butcher at Lisburn, a few miles from Belfast. For upward of twenty years before July, 1895, Leathem had carried on business in Lisburn, having as one of his constant customers, Andrew Munce, who kept a butcher's shop at Belfast, to whom he supplied weekly £20 or £30 worth of the best meat; and he had in his employ as assistants several men at weekly wages.

The Belfast Journeymen Butchers' and Assistants' Association was formed in 1893. Leathem was not a member, nor were any of his assistants. The members of the union adopted a rule that they would not work with non-union men, and would not cut up meat that came from a place where non-union hands were employed. Prior to 1895, there had been no controversy with Leathem but in July, 1895, Leathem was invited to attend a meeting of the union which was held at Lisburn. The defendants were there.

Leathem was notified that he must run his shop union, and must quit employing non-union labor, and that if he did not do so, the men employed by Munce, to whom Leathem had been selling meat, would be called out.

In addition to this, the Union persuaded some of Leathem's men to join the Union and quit working for Leathem. This was done in order to try to inconvenience Leathem and compel him to unionize his place of business.

Leathem brought suit, and on appeal the following was held:

> "A conspiracy to injure, if there be damage, gives rise to civil liability; and an oppressive combination differs widely from an invasion of civil rights by a single person. It is a violation of right to interfere with contractual relations recognized by law if there be no justification for the interference. This principle cannot be confined to inducements to break contracts of service. If such wrongful interference with a man's liberty of action is intended to injure and, in fact, damages a third person, such third person has a remedy by an action.
> "Annoyance and coercion by many may be actionable where like conduct on the part of one person would not be so.
> "The appellant, an officer of a trade union, in combination with other members of the Union—first, induced a servant of the respondent to break his contract with the respondent; secondly, induced a customer of the respondent, by threats of calling out the customer's men, to withdraw his custom, and thirdly, induced the respondent's servants to leave his service; Held, that the appellant had been guilty of an actionable conspiracy for which he was liable in damages and that, as there was no 'trade dispute' within the meaning of the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875, s. 3, the appellant was not entitled to the benefit of that section."

The Court in Quinn v. Leathem approved Lumley v. Gye, supra, and Temperton v. Russell, supra.

Quinn v. Leathem (1901). 70 L. J. P. C. 76, 97. (s. c. 1901, A. C. 495.) 27 E. R. C. 66, Id. ed., 1908 Supplement.

Simpson's Cases on Torts, 1908, 362.

The Glamorgan Coal Company and seventy-three other plaintiffs, owners of collieries in South Wales, brought this action against the South Wales Miners' Federation for inducing workmen in the collieries to break their contracts of service with the plaintiffs, and alternatively for wrongfully and maliciously conspiring to do so. By the terms of employment, the wages were paid upon a sliding-scale agreement, rising and falling with the price of coal. In November, 1900, the Federation fearing that the price of coal would be reduced and wages, therefore, lowered, resolved to order a "stop-day" on November 9, 1900, and informed the workmen. The order was obeyed by over 100,000 men, who took a holiday and thereby broke their contracts of service. At a conference held on November 12, 1900, between delegates of the men and the council, a resolution was passed authorizing the council to declare a general holiday at any time they might think it necessary for the protection of wages and for the industry generally. In October and November, 1901, the council ordered four stop-days for the same reason as before, and the men took a holiday on each of those days in breach of their contracts. The lower Court found that the action of the Federation was dictated by an honest desire to forward the interest of the workmen, and was not in any sense prompted by a wish to injure the masters, between whom and the men there was no quarrel or ill-will, and that there was justification or excuse for what the defendants did, and judgment was given for the defendants.

In the House of Lords, the Earl of Halsbury, Lord Chancellor, said:

> "I cannot think that in this case there is anything to be determined except the question of fact. I say so because the questions of law discussed are so well settled by authority, and by authority in this House.
> "To combine to procure a number of persons to break contracts is manifestly unlawful. This is found as a fact to have been done here, and is also found to have caused serious damage to the persons who were entitled to have these contracts performed."

And the following was held:

"To interfere with contractual relations recognized by law, as by inducing and procuring another to break his contract, is an actionable wrong unless there be sufficient justification for the interference.

"Thus, the officers and executive council of a federation of miners are liable in damages for procuring the members of the federation to stop work on certain days in breach of their contracts of employment and without notice to their employers, it being no defense that the wrong thus committed was done without malice or ill-will towards the employers, and for the sole purpose of keeping up the price of coal and the wages of the miners."

Simpson's Cases on Torts, 1908, 342.

In Long v. Larkin, et al., first tried in an Irish divisional court and then in the Irish Court of Appeal, [1914] 2 I. R. 285; Long, a stevedore, hired dock laborers, many of whom were members of a trade union known as the Irish Transport Union. There was also a Stevedores' Association formed in order to compel ship owners to pay higher rates, which Association plaintiff refused to join. In order to compel plaintiff to do so, the officers of the Union and Association conspired together to induce his laborers to break their contracts with him and to leave his employment, and also to induce workmen to refuse to work for him. In the King's Bench Division, Kenny, J., said:

"The case is a very important one from the points of view of both employer and employed—involving, as it does, questions as to the legality of acts which are alleged to invade unjustifiably the civil rights of another,—the effect of such acts when done by several in combination,—and the protection which the Trade Disputes Act, 1906, for the first time afforded to acts done in furtherance of a trade dispute. These questions have been the subject of consideration by the House of Lords in The Mogul Case (1) in 1892; Allen v. Flood (2) in 1898; Quinn v. Leathem (3) in 1901; The Glamorgan Case (4) in 1905; and Conway v. Wade (5) in 1909; and while it is sometimes not a very easy task to reconcile certain of the judgments when one is seeking for uniformity in the grounds and reasons on which they are based, large principles have been laid down which cannot fail to afford a guide in cases of a similar or analogous character. * * *

"It has not been disputed in the course of the arguments before us, and could not be, having regard to the dicta in the speeches in the House of Lords in the cases I have mentioned, that, inasmuch as damages are recoverable for breach of a contract, such breach is unlawful in the sense explained by Lord Lindley in Quinn v. Leathem (1), and, being unlawful, the act of anyone inducing or procuring such breach is also unlawful and consequently actionable where damage has been sustained. If several persons combine to induce or procure such breach, each of them makes himself liable to an action for what is a tortious act and can be proceeded against by way of action for conspiracy. In such an action the gist of the action is not the conspiracy, but the wrongful act done in pursuance of it, namely, the inducing or procuring of the breach of contract. It is, I think, unnecessary for the purposes of the present case to consider in what circumstances conspiracy would be the basis and gist of an action, or in what circumstances a combination of two or more persons to do a certain act could alter the character of the latter and render actionable in the case of several what would be innocent in the case of a single person. * * *

"Whether the act of inducing or procuring be that of a single individual or of a number of individuals in combination, it is a tortious act—unlawful and actionable if committed without justification: Quinn v. Leathem (1); The Glamorgan Case (2). It was argued that this case and the Mogul Case (3) were not dissimilar, and that the defendants here were acting merely in their own interests and within legal bounds. But in the Mogul Case (3) the defendants were acquitted of having resorted to any unlawful means in order to accomplish their objects, and it is manifest that if it had been established in that case that the defendants had endeavored to procure the breaking of contracts the result would have been different. The Glamorgan Case (2) is as striking a one of self interest as the Mogul Case (3), and its decision leaves no doubt upon the law that no matter what the motive of the defendants be—no matter how bona fide and free from malice or ill-will it may be—if, in endeavoring to attain their object, whether that object be a selfish and personal one or of a broader character, they purposely procure or induce an unlawful act, such as the breaking of contracts, to be committed, they are guilty of an actionable wrong. It is said that in the present case breaches of contract were not contemplated because it was considered that there would be no contracts entered into by the dock laborers; but such a contention is an idle one in the face of what actually occurred, for the men were ordered out when they were in the very act of the discharge to which their hiring related.

"On the question of justification for their action, the Glamorgan Case (1) is a direct authority. A prima facie actionable wrong was committed in that case, just as one is alleged to have been committed in the present, and it was sought to be justified on the ground that the defendants' federation or council who had directed and ordered the strike that involved the breach of the miner's contracts had in so doing acted honestly, without malice, and with the object only of keeping up the price of coal by which their wages were regulated. So far as the motive of self-interest was concerned that case was on the same plane as the Mogul Case (2), but differed from it in the methods employed to carry out the defendants' object. It was not denied that there might be some cases of a very special character which would afford a justification for that which in itself was an actionable wrong; but even in a case in its facts so strongly founded on good faith and the absence of indirect motive as the Glamorgan Case (1), the House of Lords were unanimous in holding that there was no lawful excuse or justification for the interference with contractual relations. The present case seems to me to be an a fortiori one."

From this decision, an appeal was taken to the House of Lords which affirmed the decision of the Irish Court of Appeal.

From the opinion of Lord Atkinson, the following is taken:

"Serjeant Sullivan, on behalf of the appellants, insisted that the fact that the members of the Transport Union thought it for their own interest to pass a rule that they should not work for a stevedore who was not a member of the Stevedore's Union was quite legitimate, that they were not bound to work for him or for any other person for whom they did not choose to work, and were, in the legitimate promotion of their own interest, entitled, within the decision of Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor, Gow & Co. (1), to observe that rule, though it might incidentally cause injury to those who desired to employ these workmen, but for whom they themselves did not desire to work. It is undoubtedly true that the members of a trade union need not work for those for whom they do not desire to work. That is the right to personal freedom of action referred to in the following well-known passages from the judgment of Lord Bramwell in Reg. v. Druitt (2) and from the essay of Sir W. Erle on Trade Unions (p. 12). They have been many times approved of in your Lordship's House. They respectively run thus: 'The liberty of a man's mind and will, to say how he should bestow himself and his means, his talents, and his industry was as much a subject of the law's protection as was that of his body.' And, 'Every person has a right under the law, as between himself and his fellow subjects, to full freedom in disposing of his own labor or his own capital, according to his own will. It follows that every person is subject to the correlative duty arising therefrom and is prohibited from any obstruction to the fullest exercise of this right which can be made compatible with the exercise of similar rights by others.'

"But it is equally true that the members of trade unions are bound to respect the right of other workmen to work for whom they please, on what terms and at what times they please, so long as they do nothing illegal, and are also bound to respect the right of an employer to undertake any work he pleases to undertake, and to employ what workmen he chooses, on whatever terms they both agree to unless there is something unlawful in his action. If, therefore, any two or more members of a trade union, whatever its rules may be, wilfully and knowingly combine to injure an employer by inducing his workmen to break their contracts with him, or not to enter into contracts with him, resulting in damage to him, that is an entirely different matter. That is an invasion of the liberty of action of others, and has no analogy to the action of the defendant in the Mogul Case (1); for there, as Lord Halsbury pointed out in Quinn v. Leathem (2), no legal right had been interfered with, no coercion of mind or will had been effected, all were left free to trade on what terms they willed, and nothing was done except in rival trading which could be supposed to interfere with the appellant's interest.

"The fact that members of a trade union are merely acting in obedience to a rule of their union believed by them to be for their benefit is no defense to an action for the breach of any contracts they have entered into—Read v. Friendly Society of Operative Stonemasons (3)—and still less is it a defense to the wilful and malicious infringement in combination of that legal right of personal freedom of action which they claim for themselves, but which others are entitled to quite as fully and as absolutely as they are."

V.

FREEDOM OF CONTRACT AS GUARANTEED BY PENNSYLVANIA LAW AGAINST INTERFERENCE FROM LABOR UNIONS. FLACCUS v. SMITH.

In perfect harmony with the English cases is the case of Flaccus v. Smith, et al. (1901), 199 Pa. 128.

Flaccus was the proprietor of glass works at Tarentum, Pennsylvania. He ran his works non-union, and his employes consisted of men and apprentices, all of whom had agreed with their employer not to connect themselves with the Union, which in that case was otherwise known as the American Flint Glass Workers Union, affiliated with the American Federation of Labor.

The defendants in the case, W. J. Smith and others, were members of the American Flint Glass Workers' Union, and they tried to unionize the plaintiff's glass works at Tarentum by persuading the plaintiff's employes to join their Union. Flaccus, the plaintiff, brought his suit in the Court of Common Pleas, No. 2, for Allegheny County, to enjoin the defendants from interfering with his apprentices, and upon the Court, upon final hearing, enjoining the defendants from doing the acts complained of and from persuading the apprentices to join the Union, the defendants appealed.

In the report of the case, as decided by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, Judge Brown delivering the opinion of the Court said (54 L. R. A. 642):

"The Court below found that Skelley, one of the appellants, had gatherings of the apprentices of the appellee at his room in a hotel and persuaded them to join the Union referred to; that he knew the character of the appellee's works as an independent factory, in which members of the Union were not employed and that his apprentices were bound in their indentures not to join or become subject to the rules or regulations of any such organization as he represented; that he knew these facts at the time he swore in these apprentices as members of the Union; that the apprentices who joined the Union violated the covenant of their indenture and subjected themselves to the orders of the Union, which made obedience to it paramount to obedience to their employer; that the object of Skelley was to break down the appellee's factory as a non-union factory, either by preventing the operation of his works or compelling him to join the Union; that the apprentices who joined the Union, enticed and persuaded so to do by Skelley, violated an express covenant of their indenture, which was one of great importance to the appellee, and Skelley so knew at the time he so enticed them; that Skelley's conduct and actions were very injurious to the appellee and his business, and, if repeated and persisted in, would in all probability utterly ruin his business; that Skelley's co-defendants, by their counsel, openly and boldly justified him in all he did, contending that, as an officer or agent of the Union, he had a perfect right to interfere with plaintiff's apprentices, persuade them to join the Union, and secretly swear them in as members; that, if the Union had that right, either Skelley or some other agent could go to Tarentum at any time and interfere with the appellee's apprentices and business until it would be destroyed."

In deciding this case Judge Brown said:

"This is not a controversy between the employer and his employes, but between him and certain individuals associated as a labor union, unfriendly > to the employment of independent labor, and seeking to induce the apprentices of the employer to violate the terms of their indentures with him. No question is here raised by the employer as to what his employes may or may not do, and the complaint sets forth no misconduct by them for which relief is asked. The appellants, outsiders, having no connection with the business of the appellee, are charged with enticing and endeavoring to entice the young men employed by him to violate the covenants of their apprenticeships with him, and protection is prayed for against the threatened ruin of his business, as found by the Court below. Having reviewed all the evidence, we are not persuaded that any of the Court's findings of fact ought to be disturbed, and, with them before us, the only question to be determined is whether the injunction should go out."

And on the same page (54 L. R. A. 642) in affirming the action of the lower Court, Judge Brown for the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania said:

> "The appellee had an unquestioned right, in the conduct of his business, to employ workmen who were independent of any labor union, and he had the further right to adopt a system of apprenticeship which excluded his apprentices from membership in such a union. He was responsible to no one for his reasons in adopting such a system, and no one had a right to interfere with it to his prejudice or injury. Such an interference with it was an interference with his business, and, if unlawful, cannot be permitted. The Court found that the interference was injurious to him, and, if allowed to continue, would utterly ruin his business. The damages resulting from such an injury are incapable of ascertainment at law, and justice demands that specific relief be furnished in a court of equity. The test of equity jurisdiction is the absence of a plain and adequate remedy at law to the injured party, depending upon the character of the case as disclosed in the pleadings. If equity alone can furnish relief, the injunction must be issued."

Counsel for the defendants criticized in the lower court the case of Flaccus v. Smith, said it was not applicable because it was a case of enticement of apprentices, who, for all that appeared from the report, might have been bound out to service for a period of years, the term of apprenticeship not having expired; and further criticized the case on the ground that, by the enticement, Flaccus, the plaintiff, was deprived of the further services of his apprentices, and that, in this case, which is now at the bar of this Court, the plaintiff would, by the terms of its contracts with its employes, be, of its own volition, terminating those contracts upon plaintiff's employes joining the Union.

The entire record of the case of Flaccus v. Smith is in the prothonotary's office at Pittsburgh, 790, Oct. Term, 1899, Court Common Pleas No. 2, Allegheny County, Pa. That record shows that the period of apprenticeship in each case was four years. Some had expired; some had not. Some of the apprentices were still under age; some were over the age of twenty-one years, but still working as apprentices. The bill was framed solely upon the ground that the defendants interfered with the contract relation created by the indentures of apprenticeship, each of which contained a clause which forbade the apprentice during his apprenticeship from joining any labor union or other organization which would interfere with the proper performance of his duties as apprentice while he remained an apprentice. The apprenticeship indentures did not mention the American Flint Glass Workers Union by name, and the question whether or not a breach of the indenture of apprenticeship was brought about by the apprentice joining the American Flint Glass Workers Union was a question of fact which the Court decided in favor of Flaccus.

When the apprentices joined the Union they were given their choice by Flaccus, either to renounce the Union or to quit work. Some renounced the Union, and others quit work and adhered to the Union. And it was claimed by the defendants that the plaintiff, Flaccus, discharged the apprentices, and, therefore, had no cause of complaint against the defendants who had simply persuaded the apprentices to join the Union. The plaintiff's counsel in that case replied to that argument by saying, if Flaccus permitted the apprentices who had joined the Union to continue at work, his factory would soon be unionized, and that was just what the defendants were trying to accomplish and just what Flaccus was trying to prevent.

So, in the case now at the bar of this Court, plaintiff's employes have each made an express contract not to join the United Mine Workers of America, and there is no question of fact in this case, as there was in the Flaccus case, as to whether joining that Union would be detrimental to the interests of the employer, and, therefore, violative of the contract. The language of plaintiff's contracts with its employes is specific. Each employe has agreed not to join the United Mine Workers of America.

Plaintiff's case is a stronger case than the Flaccus case. And to establish that, in addition to the reference above made to the difference in the contracts in the two cases, a stronger case is presented for plaintiff by consideration of the fact that in the Flaccus case the persons enticed were merely apprentices, while in plaintiff's case the persons enticed are employes.

Dean Bigelow says:

> "It was formerly matter of some doubt whether an action could be maintained for interrupting, with notice, the gratuitous relation of master and servant. It was sometimes supposed that inasmuch as the master could not require the service, he had no right to it which could be infringed. But this view does not now obtain. Though a person may not be able to require a gratuity he has a right to it when it is given and as it is being received, and no one may lawfully interrupt his actual enjoyment of it. Hence, if a person be actually engaged in giving his services to another without reward, any one who with notice interrupts the service becomes liable for any damage sustained." Bigelow on Torts, Eighth ed. 259, 260.

VI.

FREEDOM OF CONTRACT AS GUARANTEED BY WEST VIRGINIA LAW AGAINST INTERFERENCE FROM LABOR UNIONS.

In State v. Goodwill (1889), 33 W. Va., 179; 10 S. E., 285, 287; 6 L. R. A., 621; 25 Am. St. Rep., 863, it is said:

"A person living under the protection of this government has the right to adopt and follow any lawful industrial pursuit, not injurious to the community, which he may see fit. And, as incident to this, is the right to labor or employ labor; make contracts in respect thereto, upon such terms as may be agreed upon by the parties; to enforce all lawful contracts; to sue, and give evidence; and to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, and convey property of every kind. The enjoyment or deprivation of these rights and privileges constitutes the essential distinction between freedom and slavery; between liberty and oppression."

And again—

"The vocation of an employer, as well as that of his employe, is his property. Depriving the owner of property of one of its attributes is depriving him of his property, under the provisions of the Constitution. People v. Otis, 90 N. Y. 48. The right to use, buy, and sell property, and contract in respect thereto, including contracts for labor—which is, as we have seen, property—is protected by the Constitution. If the legislature without any public necessity, has the power to prohibit or restrict the right of contract between private persons in respect to one lawful trade or business, then it may prevent the prosecution of all trades, and regulate all contracts."

And in the same case—

"The rights of every individual must stand or fall by the same rule of law that governs every other member of the body politic under similar circumstances; and every partial or private law which directly proposes to destroy or affect individual rights, or does the same thing by restricting the privileges of certain classes of citizens and not of others, when there is no public necessity for such discrimination, is unconstitutional and void."

State v. Goodwill, 32 W. Va., 179, supra.

The Thacker Coal & Coke Company engaged in mining coal in West Virginia, brought suit in the Circuit Court of Mingo County against Burke and others, respresenting the United Mine Workers of America, for enticing the company's servants from the company's service. The Thacker Coal & Coke Company was running non-union, and the purpose of the defendants was to require the company to run its mine union. In the lower Court the declaration upon demurrer was dismissed, and the company sued out a writ of error. The Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia in the case of Thacker Coal & Coke Company v. Burke (1906), 59 W. Va. 253, 53 S. E. 161, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1091, 6 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 885, held:

> "One who maliciously entices a servant in actual service of a master to desert and quit his service is liable to action therefor."
>
> "If one wantonly and maliciously, whether for his own benefit or not, induces a person to violate his contract with a third person, to the injury of that third person, it is actionable."
>
> "Persons who conspire to induce others to break a valid contract between other persons are liable to action therefor."
>
> "The act found in Code, 1899, § 14, appendix, p. 1053, does not authorize any individual, or number of individuals, to maliciously entice servants to desert service in which they are engaged, or to prevent them from engaging in such service under a contract for such service."

Id., 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1091, 1092. Syl. 1, 2, 3, 4.

Judge Brannon, in delivering the opinion of the Court in the Thacker case, said:

> "The Thacker Coal & Coke Company filed a declaration in trespass on the case in the Circuit Court of Mingo County against Charles Burke and five others for damages for enticing servants from the plaintiff's service, which declaration upon demurrer was dismissed, and the company sued out a writ of error.
> "Certain legal principles control the case. In West Virginia Transp. Co. v. Standard Oil Co., 50 W. Va. 611, 56 L. R. A. 804, 88 Am. St. Rep. 895, 40 S. E., 591, we find it stated, on authority there given, that 'if one wantonly and maliciously, whether for his own benefit or not, induce a person to violate his contract with a third person to the injury of that third person, it is actionable.' We find that holding confirmed in Angle v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co.,

151 U. S. 1, 38 L. ed. 55, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 240, in the language following: 'If one maliciously interferes in a contract between two parties, and induces one of them to break that contract, to the injury of the other, the party injured can maintain an action against the wrongdoer. When a man does an act which in law and fact is a wrongful act, and injury to another results from it as a natural and probable consequence, an action on the case will lie.' If additional authority were needed for such a proposition of common sense and justice, see the case decided by the highest English tribunal in 1901, Quinn v. Leathem (1901), A. C. 495. What I have already said refers to contracts in general. As to the particular contract between master and servant, the law is, if possible, yet more decided. The common law says that one who causes a breach of that contract is liable to damages. It has been said by some that action in such case lies only by reason of the act of Parliament in the reign of Edward III, A. D. 1350, making the act of enticement of a servant from his employer wrongful. If so, we might hesitate in saying that it is actionable in West Virginia; but I assert, believing that I am supported by ample authority, that action is given in such case by the common law. So the text writers and courts treat it. In Comyns's Digest, title 'Action on the Case,' A, p. 278, the common law rule is thus stated: 'In all cases where a man has a temporal loss or damage by the wrong of another, he may have an action upon the case to be repaired in damages.' The Supreme Court of the United States, in Angle v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. supra, stated the rule thus: 'Wherever a man does an act which in law and in fact is a wrongful act, and such an act as may, as a natural and probable consequence of it, produce injury to another, and which in the particular case does produce such an injury, an action on the case will lie.' It is generally treated as a common-law cause of action. The general principle applicable to contracts in general would give action against a third party for wrongfully causing the breach of contract between master and servant; but as to this particular contract the law has been long settled:

"I cite the following authorities: 'It is well settled that any person who knowingly entices away the servant of another, and thereby induces him to violate his contract with his master, or who thereby deprives the master of the services of one then actually in his service, whether under a contract to serve or not, is liable to the master for his actual loss therefrom. But in this action it is necessary to prove not only that the person employed was in the service of the plaintiff, but also that the defendant, knowing the fact, wrongfully induced him to leave it. The intent of the defendant, and the natural or actual effect of its execution, is the gist of the action; and, unless the declaration discloses that the act was done intentionally or wilfully, and that it actually did, or was calculated to, cause damage to the plaintiff, and that it was done without right or justifiable cause, no recovery can be had. Malice is inferred from the wrongful character of the act, and the declaration or complaint must disclose such facts as support the inference. If a contract to serve is established, actual service under the contract need not be shown. It is enough to show that the defendant, with notice of the servant's contract obligation to the plaintiff, has persuaded him not to enter into the plaintiff's service under it.' Wood, Mast. & S. §§ 230, 231. 'The idea of interference with contract relations as a specific tort is of recent origin. The materials from which the generalization was worked out are found in several lines of precedents. From an early day it has been established that a master may maintain an action against one who entices away his servant or harbors and detains him with knowledge of his former contract.' 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 1109. 'Certainly since the statute of laborers the common law has recognized the right of a master to recover for the actual damage he may have suffered by the wrongful interference by a third person with his relationship to his servant by personal injury to the servant, or otherwise depriving the master, in whole or in part, of his service. * * * Actions for enticing servants from their employer, and for knowingly harboring servants who had previously left their employer, arose after the first statute of laborers. They survive its repeal, and occur in modern practice. Knowingly enticing from the service of another one who is employed under a contract not fully executed is an actionable wrong. Indeed, from this basis there has grown up a branch of law in which malice is an essential ingredient.' Jaggard, Torts, § 155. 'To the relation between master and servant, and the rights accruing therefrom, there are two species of injuries incident. The one is retaining a man's hired servant before his time is expired; the other is beating or confining him in such a manner that he is not able to perform his work. As to the first, the retaining another person's servant during the time he has agreed to serve his present master. This, as it is an ungentlemanlike, so it is also an illegal, act; for every master has by his contract purchased for a valuable consideration the service of his domestics for a limited time. The inveigling or hiring his servant, which induces a breach of this contract, is therefore an injury to the master, and for that injury the law has given him a remedy by a special action on the case; and he may also have an action against the servant for the nonperformance of his agreement. But, if the new master was not apprised of the former contract, no action lies against him unless he refuses to restore the servant upon demand.' Bl. Com. bk. 2, 142.

"I deem it useless to occupy space by quotation from other text-books and decisions to prove the doctrine above stated. They all lay down the law to the same effect. 2 Kinkead, Torts, § 457; 3 Page, Contr. §§ 1326, 1327; 11 Am. St. Rep. 378, 474, notes; Schouler, Dom. Rel. § 487; Moran v. Dunphy, 177 Mass. 485, 52 L. R. A. 115, 83 Am. St. Rep. 289, 59 N. E. 125; Bowen v. Hall, L. R. 6 Q. B. Div. 333; Walker v. Cronin, 107 Mass. 555; Quinn v. Leathem (1901), A. C. 495; Taff Vale R. Co. v. Amalgamated Soc. (1901), A. C. 426. Hammon on Contracts, § 350, says: 'The duty to respect the contractual tie so far as not to interfere with it rests upon all the world. Thus it is everywhere agreed that it is an actionable wrong to entice away a man's servant from his employment. Independently of any right to sue the servant for breach of the contract of employment, the master may hold the guilty person liable in damages for thus wrongfully inducing the servant to sever the relation. Many courts, indeed go further, and lay down the broad principle that a man who justifiably induces one of two parties to a contract to break it, intending thereby to injure the other or to obtain a benefit for himself, does that other a wrong, for which he must respond in damages.'

"The first count of the declaration alleges that the company is owner and operator of a coal mine, and was engaged on the 8th day of August, 1901, in the business of mining coal from the mine; that, in order to carry on the business, it was necessary for the plaintiff to employ, and it did employ, a large number of men to work in the mine, who were engaged in the company's service in working the mine and loading coal on railroad cars for shipment to parties with whom the plaintiff had contracts to furnish coal; that the defendants, well knowing these facts, but contriving and wickedly and maliciously intending to injure the plaintiff in its business, unlawfully, wrongfully, maliciously, without justifiable cause, without the consent and against the will of the plaintiff, molested, obstructed, and hindered the plaintiff in its said business 'by wilfully, wrongfully, and maliciously persuading, inducing, enticing, and procuring said servants of the plaintiff, employed as aforesaid, to absent themselves and depart from the plaintiff's service'; that on pretext, and by reason of such persuasion, enticement, and procuration, the said servants on the date aforesaid, without license and against the will and consent of the plaintiff, wrongfully absented themselves and departed from said service, and continued to do so; that the plaintiff was unable to employ other servants to work in its mine in the place of the servants so enticed away, and was thereby prevented from prosecuting and carrying on its business as extensively and profitably as it could and would have done had not its servants been induced and enticed by the defendants to quit its service. The first count does not, in words, state an express contract for service between employer and employe. By the language used in the books a contract must exist. This count says the miners were 'employed' by the plaintiff and in actual service. Now, if the law gives action for enticement of a servant, it is not conceivable that a third person can maliciously entice away a lot of employes simply because there was no contract fixing term of service. The relation of master and servant exists. In such case there is a contract recognized by law, an implied contract by which the employe can recover for his service. By entering such service the employe agrees, contracts, to work. IT IS NO DIFFERENCE THAT HE CAN QUIT WHEN HE PLEASES."

VII.

FREEDOM OF CONTRACT GUARANTEED BY THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES AS CONSTRUED BY THIS COURT.

The Fifth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States contains this clause:

"Nor [shall any person] be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law."

9 F. S. A., p. 288.

"A similar clause, as an inhibition on the States, is contained in the Fourteenth Amendment."

Note 1, 9 F. S. A., p. 288.

On page 289 of 9 F. S. A., it is said of the foregoing language of Amendment Five:

"This Amendment only announces and reaffirms the ancient principles of the common law, and prevents them from being unjustly invaded by the power of the federal government."

North Carolina v. Vanderford, (1888) 35 Fed. Rep. 282.

On page 290, 9 F. S. A., it is said that this provision of the Fifth Amendment has application to corporations as well as to natural persons.

"VI. Application to Corporations.—From the nature of the prohibitions in this amendment it would seem, with the exception of the last clause, as though they would only apply to natural persons. No others can be witnesses; no others can be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb, or compelled to be witnesses against themselves; and therefore it might be said with much force that the word "person," there used in connection with the prohibition against the deprivation of life, liberty, and property without due process of law, is in like manner limited to a natural person. But such has not been the construction of the courts. A similar provision is found in nearly all of the State constitutions; and everywhere, and at all times, and in all courts, it has been held, either by tacit assent or express adjudication, to extend, so far as their property is concerned, to corporations. And this has been because the property of a corporation is in fact the property of the corporators. To deprive the corporation of its property, or to burden it, is, in fact, to deprive the corporators of their property or to lessen its value."

> of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; and it has been assumed, if not expressly held, that the provision protects the property of corporations against confiscation equally with that of individuals. San Mateo County v. Southern Pac. R. Co. (1882), 13 Fed. Rep., 151."

The word "liberty" as defined in State law. The word "liberty" as an element in that famous trilogy of rights defined by the formula, "life, liberty and property," means far more than "the rights of the citizen to be free from the mere physical restraint of his person": it covers and protects many rights embraced within the guaranty given by the word "property" in the same formula. Turning to the States as the first source of interpretation we find that in State v. Goodwill, 33 West Virginia, 179, the Court said: "The vocation of an employer, as well as that of his employe, is his property. Depriving the owner of property of one of its attributes is depriving him of his property under the provisions of the Constitution. People v. Otis, 90 N. Y., 48. The right to use, buy and sell property, and contract in respect thereto, including contracts for labor—which is, as we have seen, property—is protected by the Constitution. If the legislature without any public necessity, has the power to prohibit or restrict the right of contract between private persons in respect to one lawful trade or business, then it may prevent the prosecution of all trades, and regulate all contracts." In State v. Stewart, 59 Vermont 273, the Court said: "The principle upon which the cases, English and American, proceed, is, that every man has the right to employ his talents, industry and capital as he pleases, free from the dictation of others; and if two or more persons combine to coerce his choice in this behalf, it is a criminal conspiracy. The labor and skill of the workman, be it of high or low degree, the plant of the manufacturer, the equipment of the farmer, the investments of commerce, are all in equal sense property." In Braceville Coal Company v. People, 147 Illinois 66, the Court said: "the right of property preserved by the Constitution, is the right not only to possess and enjoy it, but also to acquire it in any lawful mode, or by following any lawful industrial pursuit which the citizen, in the exercise of the liberty guaranteed, may choose to adopt. Labor is the primary foundation of all wealth. The property which each one has in his own labor is the common heritage. And, as an incident to the right to acquire other property, the liberty to enter into contracts by which labor may be employed in such way as the laborer shall deem most beneficial, and of others to employ such labor, is necessarily included in the constitutional guaranty." See also Matter of Jacobs, 98 New York 98, People v. Marx, 99 New York 377. In Young's Case v. Virginia, 101 Virginia 853, the Court said: "The word 'liberty', as used in the Constitution of the United States, and of the several States, is deemed to embrace the right of a citizen to be free in the employment of all his faculties; to be free to use them in all lawful ways; to live and work where he will; to earn his livelihood by any lawful calling, and for that purpose to enter into all contracts which may be proper, necessary, and essential to his carrying out to a successful conclusion the purpose above mentioned."

The word "liberty" as defined in Federal law. In his concurring opinion in Butchers' Union, etc., Co. v. Crescent City, etc. Co. 111 U. S. 746, Justice Field said: "As in our intercourse with our fellow-men certain principles of morality are assumed to exist, without which society would be impossible, so certain inherent rights lie at the foundation of all governmental action, and upon a recognition of them alone can free institutions be maintained. These inherent rights have never been more happily expressed than in the Declaration of Independence, that new evangel of liberty to the people: 'We hold these truths to be self-evident,' that is, so plain that their truth is recognized upon their mere statement, 'that all men are endowed'; not by edicts of Emperors or decrees of Parliament or Acts of Congress, but 'by their Creator, with certain inalienable rights,' that is, rights which cannot be bartered away or given away or taken away except in punishment of crime, 'and that among these are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness, and to secure these,' not grant them but secure them, 'governments are instituted among men deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed.'

Among these inalienable rights, as proclaimed in that great document, is the right of men to pursue their happiness, by which is meant the right to pursue any lawful business or vocation, in any manner not inconsistent with the equal rights of others, which may increase their prosperity or develop their faculties, so as to give to them their highest enjoyment." The same great judge in his dissenting opinion in the Slaughter-House Cases, 16 Wall. 36, said that the Fourteenth Amendment "was intended to give practical effect to the Declaration of 1776 of inalienable rights, rights which are the gift of the Creator; which the law does not confer, but only recognizes." In his dissenting opinion in that case, Justice Swayne said: "Property is everything which has an exchangeable value, and the right of property includes the power to dispose of it according to the will of the owner. Labor is property, and as such merits protection. The right to make it available is next in importance to the rights of life and liberty." In Allgeyer v. Louisiana, 165 U. S. 578, the Court said: The "liberty" mentioned in the Fourteenth Amendment "means not only the right of the citizen to be free from the mere physical restraint of his person, as by incarceration, but the term is deemed to embrace the right of the citizen to be free in the enjoyment of all his faculties; to be free to use them in all lawful ways; to live and work where he will; to earn his livelihood by any lawful calling; to pursue any livelihood or avocation, and for that purpose to enter into all contracts which may be proper, necessary, and essential to his carrying out to a successful conclusion the purposes above mentioned." In Adair v. United States, 208 U. S. 161, the Court said: "The first inquiry is whether the part of the 10th section of the act of 1898 upon which the first count of the indictment was based, is repugnant to the Fifth Amendment of the Constitution, declaring that no person shall be deprived of liberty or property without due process of law. In our opinion that section, in the particular mentioned, is an invasion of the personal liberty, as well as of the right of property, guaranteed by that Amendment. Such liberty and right embrace the right to make contracts for the purchase of the labor of others, and equally the right to make contracts for the sale of one's own labor"; in Lochner v. New York, 198 U. S. 45, which involved the validity of a State enactment prescribing certain maximum hours for labor in bakeries, and which made it a misdemeanor for an employer to require or permit an employe in such an establishment to work in excess of a given number of hours each day, the Court said: "The general right to make a contract in relation to his business is part of the liberty of the individual protected by the Fourteenth Amendment of the Federal Constitution. Allgeyer v. Louisiana, 165 U. S. 578. Under that provision no State can deprive any person of life, liberty or property without due process of law. The right to purchase or to sell labor is part of the liberty protected by this Amendment, unless there are circumstances which exclude the right"; and the Court added "the liberty of contract relating to labor includes both parties to it. The one has as much right to purchase as the other to sell labor."

Interference with that Contract Right.

Angle, plaintiff's intestate, was a railroad contractor, and had contracted to do certain work in constructing the line of the Chicago, Portage, and Superior Railway Company, which had certain land granted to it, said to be worth about $4,000,000. The Chicago, St. P., M. & O. R. Co. wanted to stop the construction of the Chicago, Portage, and Superior Railway Company and to acquire the land which had been granted. While Angle was prosecuting his work in building the line, and had 1,600 men employed, and the completion of the line on or before May 5, 1882, was an assured fact, unless Angle was interfered with, the defendant company conspired with other parties to wrest the land grant from the Chicago, Portage, and Superior Railway Company, and to that end prevent the completion of the contract by Angle and the construction of the road. The Chicago, St. P., M. & O. R. Co. got control of the stock of the Chicago, Portage, and Superior Railway Company, and then notified the engineers and Angle that the company had been sold out, and advised them to protect themselves, because the company could not pay or protect them. As a result the several engineering corps were broken up, the engineers left the work, all the tools, material, and other personal property belonging to the contractor and to the company were attached at suit of the merchant creditors, and the 1,600 laborers dispersed and went elsewhere for work.

Following that, the Chicago, St. P., M. & O. R. Co., and those it conspired with, succeeded in getting the Legislature of Wisconsin to pass an act forfeiting and revoking the land grant to the Chicago, Portage, and Superior Railway Company and bestow it on the Chicago, St. P., M. & O. R. Co.

After the contract with Angle was thus broken, he commenced an action at law against the Chicago, Portage, and Superior Railway Company. He died while the suit was pending, and suit was revived in the name of his administratrix. The plaintiff recovered judgment in that suit for more than $200,000.00, an execution was issued and returned nulla bona, and thereupon the bill in this case was filed to reach the land grant in the hands of the Chicago, St. P., M. & O. R. Co.

This Court held:

> "If one maliciously interferes in a contract between two parties, and induces one of them to break that contract to the injury of the other, the party injured can maintain an action against the wrong-doer."

And further held that the defendant company had wrongfully interfered and brought about a breach of the contract which Angle had with the Chicago, Portage, and Superior Railway Company, and that the land which the Portage Company first had, and which had been secured by the Omaha Company was liable for the judgment which had been obtained against the Chicago, Portage, and Superior Railway Company.

The Court, in announcing the above doctrine, based its conclusion in part upon the decisions in the cases of Lumley v. Gye, supra, Bowen v. Hall, supra, and Walker v. Cronin, 107 Mass. 555, in which latter case a manufacturer was held entitled to maintain an action against a third party, who, with the unlawful purpose of preventing him from carrying on his business, wilfully induced many of his employes to leave his employment, whereby the manufacturer lost their services, and the profits and advantages which he would have derived therefrom.

Bitterman was engaged in the business of scalping railroad tickets. The Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company issued non-transferable excursion tickets at reduced rates. Bitterman, with knowledge of their non-transferability, bought up tickets and resold them. The purchaser, when required to identify himself, personated the original purchaser, and the Railroad Company was deprived of the additional revenue it would have obtained had the second purchaser purchased a full rate ticket, as he doubtless would have done had it not been for Bitterman's scalping business.

The railroad had given notice of its intention to issue a certain excursion reduced rate ticket, and in order to stop Bitterman from scalping those tickets it applied to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana for an injunction.

The Supreme Court of the United States held on appeal that, carrying on the business of purchasing and selling non-transferable reduced-rate excursion railroad tickets for profit, to the injury of the Railroad Company issuing such tickets, is an actionable wrong, although actual malice in the sense of personal ill will may not exist.

And Mr. Justice White, in deciding the case, referred to and approved the doctrine announced in the case of Angle v. Chicago, St. P., M. & O. R. Co., supra, that an actionable wrong is committed by one "who maliciously interferes in a contract between two parties, and induces one of them to break that contract, to the injury of the other."

Mr. Justice White said:

> "We deem it unnecessary to restate the grounds upon which the ruling in the Angle case was rested, or to trace the evolution of the principle in that case announced, because of the consideration given to the subject in the Angle case, and the full reference to the authorities which was made in the opinion in that case."

The West Virginia Transportation Company was engaged in transporting petroleum oil by means of pipe lines and tank cars from Volcano and vicinity to Parkersburg, and in storing oil, and had expended $300,000.00 in acquiring lands, rights of way, etc., and had built up a large business. The Standard Oil Company determined to force the West Virginia Transportation Company out of business, and thereupon conspired with the West Virginia Oil Company to prevent the West Virginia Transportation Company from continuing its business, and from transporting oil through its pipe lines by means of its tank cars and from storing oil. The West Virginia Oil Company was organized to purchase and operate what was known as the property of the West Virginia Oil and Land Company, a territory which was served by plaintiff's pipe lines, and from which it had transported oil for compensation for several years. The Standard Oil Company acquired stock in the West Virginia Oil Company and dictated its management. The Standard Oil Company caused the construction of the Eureka Pipe Line to serve the same territory. As a result the business of the plaintiff was ruined. In holding the Standard Oil Company liable for the damage, the Court held:

"If one wantonly and maliciously, whether for his own benefit or not, induce a person to violate his contract with a third person to the injury of that third person, it is actionable."

West Virginia Transportation Company v. Standard Oil Company (1900). 50 W. Va. 611. 40 S. E. 491. 56 L. R. A. 804. 88 Am. St. Rep. 895.

The Thacker Coal & Coke Company, engaged in mining coal in West Virginia, brought suit in the Circuit Court of Mingo County against Burke and others, representing the United Mine Workers of America, for enticing the company's servants from the company's service. The Thacker Coal & Coke Company was running non-union, and the purpose of the defendants was to require the company to run its mine union. In the lower Court the declaration upon demurrer was dismissed, and the company sued out a writ of error. The Supreme Court reversed the lower Court, and held:

"(1) One who maliciously entices a servant in actual service of a master to desert and quit his service is liable to action therefor; (2) If one wantonly and maliciously, whether for his own benefit or not, induces a person to violate his contract with a third person to the injury of that third person, it is actionable; (3) Persons who conspire to induce others to break a valid contract between other persons are liable to action therefor."

Thacker Coal & Coke Company v. Burke et als., (1906). 59 W. Va. 253. 53 S. E. 161. 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1091. 8 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 885.

Freedom of contract denied by State law making it a crime for an employer to impose a certain condition on employe. In Coppage v. Kansas, 236 U. S. 1, it was held that the freedom of contract guaranteed by the 14th Amendment was denied by a law of that State, as construed and applied by its highest court, imposing criminal punishment upon an employer or his agent for having prescribed as a condition upon which one might secure employment (terminable at will), under, or remain in the service of such employer that the employe (free to exercise a voluntary choice) should enter into an agreement not to become or remain a member of any labor organization while so employed. After carefully analyzing and comparing the judgment in Adair v. United States, 208 U. S. 161, the Court said:

> "When a man is called upon to agree not to become or remain a member of the union while working for a particular employer, he is in effect only asked to deal openly and frankly with his employer, so as not to retain the employment upon terms to which the latter is not willing to agree. And the liberty of making contracts does not include a liberty to procure employment from an unwilling employer, or without a fair understanding. Nor may the employer be foreclosed by legislation from exercising the same freedom of choice that is the right of the employe. To ask a man to agree, in advance, to refrain from affiliation with the union while retaining a certain position of employment, is not to ask him to give up any part of his constitutional freedom. He is free to decline the employment on those terms, just as the employer may decline to offer employment on any other: For 'it takes two to make a bargain.' Having accepted employment on those terms, the man is still free to join the union when the period of employment expires; or, if employed at will, then at any time upon simply quitting the employment. And, if bound by his own agreement to refrain from joining during a stated period of employment, he is in no different situation from that which is necessarily incident to term contracts in general. For constitutional freedom of contract does not mean that a party is to be as free after making a contract as before; he is not free to break it without accountability. Freedom of contract, from the very nature of the thing, can be enjoyed only by being exercised, and each particular exercise of it involves making an engagement which, if fulfilled, prevents for the time any inconsistent course of conduct.

"So much for the reason of the matter, let us turn again to the adjudicated cases.

"The decision in the Adair Case is in accord with the almost unbroken current of authorities in the State courts. * * *

"In Coffeyville Vitrified Brick & Tile Co. v. Perry, 69 Kan. 297, 66 L. R. A. 185, 76 Pac. 848, 1 Ann. Cas. 936, the Court had under consideration chapter 120 of the Laws of 1897 (Gen. Stat. 1901, §§ 2425, 2426), which declared it unlawful for any person, company, or corporation, or agent, officer, etc., to prevent employes from joining and belonging to any labor organization, and enacted that any such person, company, or corporation, etc., that coerced, or attempted to coerce employes by discharging or threatening to discharge them because of their connection with such labor organization should be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction subjected to a fine, and should also be liable to the person injured in punitive damages. It was attacked as violative of the 14th Amendment, and also of the Bill of Rights of the State Constitution. The Court held it unconstitutional, saying: 'The right to follow any lawful vocation and to make contracts is as completely within the protection of the Constitution as the right to hold property free from unwarranted seizure, or the liberty to go when and where one will. One of the ways of obtaining property is by contract. The right, therefore, to contract cannot be infringed by the legislature without violating the letter and spirit of the Constitution. Every citizen is protected in his right to work where and for whom he will. He may select not only his employer, but also his associates. He is at liberty to refuse to continue to serve one who has in his employ a person, or an association of persons, objectionable to him. In this respect the rights of the employer and employe are equal. Any act of the legislature that would undertake to impose on an employer the obligation of keeping in his service one whom, for any reason, he should not desire, would be a denial of his constitutional right to make and terminate contracts and to acquire and hold property. Equally so would be an act the provisions of which should be intended to require one to remain in the service of one whom he should not desire to serve. The business conducted by the defendant was its property, and in the exercise of this ownership it is protected by the Constitution. It could abandon or discontinue its operation at pleasure. It had the right, beyond the possibility of legislative interference, to make any contract with reference thereto not in violation of law. In the operation of its property it may employ such persons as are desirable, and discharge, without reason, those who are undesirable. It is at liberty to contract for the services of persons in any manner that is satisfactory to both. No legislative restrictions can be imposed upon the lawful exercise of these rights."

If the Legislature may not make such restrictions, much less may the United Mine Workers of America interfere with the lawful exercise of these rights by the plaintiff.

"In five other States the courts of last resort have had similar acts under consideration, and in each instance have held them unconstitutional. In State v. Julow (1895), 129 Mo. 163, 29 L. R. A. 257, 50 Am. St. Rep. 443, 31 S. W. 781, the Supreme Court of Missouri dealt with an act (Missouri Laws, 1893, p. 187) that forbade employers, on pain of fine or imprisonment, to enter into any agreement with an employe requiring him to withdraw from a labor union or other lawful organization, or to refrain from joining such an organization, or to 'by any means attempt to compel or coerce any employe into withdrawal from any lawful organization or society.' In Gillespie v. People (1900), 188 Ill. 176, 52 L. R. A. 283, 80 Am. St. Rep. 176, 58 N. E. 1007, the Supreme Court of Illinois held unconstitutional an act (Hurd's Stat. 1899, p. 844) declaring it criminal for any individual or member of any firm, etc., to prevent or attempt to prevent employes from forming, joining, and belonging to any lawful labor organization, and that any such person 'that coerces or attempts to coerce employes by discharging or threatening to discharge them because of their connection with such lawful labor organization' should be guilty of a misdemeanor. In State ex rel. Zillmer v. Kreutzberg (1902), 114 Wis. 530, 58 L. R. A. 748, 91 Am. St. Rep. 934, 90 N. W. 1098, the Court had under consideration a statute (Wisconsin Laws, 1899, chap. 332) which, like the Kansas act now in question, prohibited the employer or his agent from coercing the employe to enter into an agreement not to become a member of a labor organization, as a condition of securing employment or continuing in the employment, and also rendered it unlawful to discharge an employe because of his being a member of any labor organization. The decision related to the latter prohibition, but this was denounced upon able and learned reasoning that has a much wider reach. In People v. Marcus (1906), 185 N. Y. 257, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 282, 113 Am. St. Rep. 902, 77 N. E. 1073, 7 Ann. Cas. 118, the statute dealt with (N. Y. Laws, 1887, chap. 688), as we have already said, was in substance identical with the Kansas act. These decisions anteuated Adair v. United States. They proceed upon broad and fundamental reasoning, the same in substance that was adopted by this Court in the Adair Case, and they are cited with approval in the opinion (208 U. S. 175). A like result was reached in State ex rel. Smith v. Daniels (1912), 118 Minn. 155, 136 N. W. 584, with respect to an act that, like the Kansas statute, forbade an employer to require an employe or person seeking employment, as a condition of such employment, to make an agreement that the employe would not become or remain a member of a labor organization. This was held invalid upon the authority of the Adair Case. And see Goldfield Consol. Mines Co. v. Goldfield Miners' Union, 159 Fed. 500, 513."

Thus sustained, both by reason and authority, the Court in Coppage v. Kansas, held:

"that the Kansas act of March 13, 1903, as construed and applied so as to punish with fine or imprisonment an employer or his agent for merely prescribing, as a condition upon which one may secure employment under or remain in the service of such employer, that the employe shall enter into an agreement not to become or remain a member of any labor organization while so employed, is repugnant to the 'due process' clause of the 14th Amendment, and therefore void."

Employment at the will of the parties does not make it employment at the will of others. The statement made in Coppage v. Kansas, 236 U. S. p. 21, that its principles apply to an employment terminable at will, suggests a reference by us to the later case of Truax, Sr. et al., v. Raich, 239 U. S. 33.

In that case the Court said:

"It is said that the bill does not show an employment for a term, and that under an employment at will the complainant could be discharged at any time for any reason or for no reason, the motive of the employer being immaterial. The conclusion, however, that is sought to be drawn is too broad. The fact that the employment is at the will of the parties, respectively, does not make it one at the will of others. The employe has manifest interest in the freedom of the employer to exercise his judgment without illegal interference or compulsion and, by the weight of authority the unjustified interference of third persons is actionable although the employment is at will. In this connection reference should again be made to the very recent case of Larkin, et al., v. Long (1915). A. C. 814–846, at pp. 829, 830. H. L. (I.), in which it was said:

> "Every person has a right under the law as between himself and his fellow subjects, to full freedom in disposing of his own labor or his own capital, according to his own will. It follows that every person is subject to the correlative duty arising therefrom, and is prohibited from any obstruction to the fullest exercise of this right, which can be made compatible with the exercise of similar rights by others. But it is equally true that the members of trade unions are bound to respect the right of other workmen to work for whom they please, on what terms and at what times they please, so long as they do nothing illegal, and are also bound to respect the right of an employer to undertake any work he pleases to undertake, and to employ what workmen he chooses, on whatever terms they both agree to, unless there is something unlawful in his action."

VIII.

RIGHT OF PETITIONER TO INJUNCTIVE RELIEF.

In the Flaccus case, heretofore cited, the Court stated the precise issue before it in these terms: "This is not a controversy between the employer and his employes, but between him and certain individuals associated as a labor union, unfriendly to the employment of independent labor, and seeking to induce the apprentices of the employer to violate the terms of their indentures with him. No question is here raised by the employer as to what his employes may or may not do, and the complaint sets forth no misconduct by them for which relief is asked." In speaking of such "relief" the Court said: "that the interference was injurious to him (the employer), and, if allowed to continue, would utterly ruin his business. The damages resulting from such an injury are incapable of ascertainment at law, and justice demands that specific relief be furnished in a court of equity." So in this case the controversy is not "between the employer and his employes, but between him and certain individuals associated as a labor union, unfriendly to the employment of independent labor," who are seeking to induce the employes of petitioner to violate the terms of their contract with petitioner. As the damages resulting from such an injury in this case, as in the Flaccus case, "are incapable of ascertainment at law, * * * justice demands that specific relief be furnished in a court of equity." And so in the Bitterman case, 207 U. S. 205, this Court said: "Concluding, as we do, that the commission of a legal wrong by the defendants was disclosed by the case as made, we are brought to consider the several contentions concerning the jurisdiction of the court and its right to afford relief. * * * Besides, the substantial character of the jurisdictional averment in the bill is to be tested, not by the mere immediate pecuniary damage resulting from the acts complained of, but by the value of the business to be protected and the rights of property, which the complainant sought to have recognized and enforced. * * * The contention that, though it be admitted, for the sake of argument, that the acts charged against the defendant 'were wrongful, tortious, or even fraudulent,' there was no right to resort to equity because there was a complete and adequate remedy at law to redress the threatened wrongs when committed, is, we think, also devoid of merit. * * * The circuit court of appeals decided that error had been committed in refusing to grant an injunction against dealing in non-transferable tickets to be issued in the future, and directed that the decree below be enlarged in that particular. It is insisted that the circuit court of appeals erred in awarding an injunction as to dealings 'in non-transferable tickets that may be hereafter issued * * * since it thereby undertook to promulgate' a rule applicable to conditions and circumstances which have not yet arisen, and to prohibit 'the petitioners from dealing in tickets not in esse * * * and is, therefore, violative of the most fundamental principles of our government.' But when the broad nature of this proposition is considered, it but denies that there is power in a court of equity in any case to afford effective relief by injunction. Certain is it that every injunction, in the nature of things, contemplates the enforcement, as against the party enjoined, of a rule of conduct for the future as to the wrong to which the injunction relates. Take the case of trespasses upon land where the elements entitling to equitable relief exist. See Slater v. Gunn, 170 Mass. 509, and cases cited. It may not be doubted that the authority of a court would extend, not only to restraining a particular imminent trespass, but also to prohibiting like acts for all future time. The power exerted by the court below which is complained of, was in no wise different. * * * The action of the circuit court of appeals, therefore, in causing the injunction to apply not only to the illegal dealings as to the then outstanding tickets, but to like dealings as to similar tickets which might be issued in the future, was but the exertion by the court of its power to restrain the continued commission against the rights of the complainant in the future of a definite character of acts adjudged to be wrongful."

An inspection of the record will show that the injunction issued in the case at bar conforms, in every particular, with the foregoing rule as this court has defined it.

We claim that defendants are not plaintiff's competitors. And we also claim that if they are in any sense competitors, they are not entitled to bring about breaches of contracts which plaintiff has with its employes. Even competition does not admit of that.

Illustrative of that branch of the law, we cite the case of—

> The American Law Book Company v. The Edward Thompson Company. (Supreme Court, New York, 1903). 41 Misc. 396.

Bischoff, J., in that case said:

> "By preliminary injunction, in an action for injunctive relief, the plaintiff seeks to restrain the defendant from making agreements with subscribers to the plaintiff's encyclopedia, whereby the defendant undertakes to indemnify these subscribers against claims for damages for their breach of contract in declining to receive and pay for the plaintiff's books, and from conducting and defraying the expenses of the defense to any action brought against the subscriber by the plaintiff.
> "The complaint alleges that these agreements have been systematically offered by the defendant to the plaintiff's subscribers for the purpose of causing them to subscribe to the defendant's encyclopedia and to repudiate their subscriptions for the work published by the plaintiff, and the allegations further disclose the making of intentional misrepresentations by the defendant to these subscribers, as to the relative merits of the encyclopedias, for the purpose of inducing the breach of contract.
> "The defendant admits the making of the agreements in question, but asserts that the plaintiff has no remedy in equity upon the allegations of the complaint, the contention being that the plaintiff has his remedy at law for each contract broken; that the party to that contract has the right to break it and pay damages, and that, what the party can do, another person may ask him to do without restraint by injunction. It is also argued that the cases in which an injunction has been granted to prevent the solicitation of a breach of contract are found to have involved only contracts for personal services, and that there is no precedent for such an injunction as the plaintiff seeks. If there be no exact precedent for this injunction, none is needed. The complaint avers, and the affidavits support the averment, that the defendant is engaged in an attempt to obtain business which the plaintiff has secured, having no regard to fairness of competition, but with resort to trick and device.

"Whether the subscribers are in each instance actually led by the defendant's misrepresentations to break the particular contracts is not important, and is not an essential averment of the complaint. Intentional false statements, made with a view to obstruct the plaintiff's business and to divert it to the defendant, are charged, and the solicitation of the subscriber's breach of contract is but a more active step in the same scheme of unfair competition.

"The fraudulent intent followed to fruition in the actual inducement of persons dealing with the plaintiff to break their contracts for the intended benefit of the defendant and to the intended injury of the plaintiff is the basis of the defendant's wrong—a wrong which our system of remedial justice recognizes as the subject of relief. Rice v. Manley, 66 N. Y. 82; Rich v. N. Y. C. & H. R. R. Co., 87 Id. 392. And see Bowen v. Hall, 6 Q. B. Div. 333.

"That an action for damages would not afford an adequate remedy is obvious. The loss of business and the injury to business reputation resulting from the defendant's acts of obstruction, and from the consequent litigation between the plaintiff and its delinquent subscribers, could not be estimated nor proven with any degree of certainty for the purposes of a recovery; nor could the plaintiff properly estimate the additional burden of the future litigation with subscribers, whose defense would (as is to be inferred from the past) be conducted by the defendant at great pains and expense, bearing no relation to the amount of the claim, but solely in the interest of obstruction and for advertising purposes.

"The invasion of a legal right being apparent and the inadequacy of relief at law being clear, a case for injunctive relief is made out, and, indeed, direct authority for an injunction upon a very similar state of facts is not wanting. Stoddard v. Key, 62 How. Pr. 137."

For an additional injunction labor case applicable to these defendants as intermeddlers, we cite—

The W. P. Davis Machine Company v. Harry Robinson, individually, and as President, etc., et al. (Supreme Court, New York, 1903). 41 Misc. 329. 84 N. Y. Supp. 837.

Nash, J., said (41 Misc. 330):

"This action is brought to restrain the defendant Robinson and the Rochester City Lodge No. 93, of the International Association of Machinists, its officers, agents, members and servants, from interfering with the business of the plaintiff."

And again on the same page 330, said:

"The allegations of the complaint supported by affidavits upon which the preliminary injunction was granted are to the effect that, in March last, the defendant union, through its executive committee and its business agent, presented to the plaintiff for signature a contract which, among other things, provided that the plaintiff would be permitted to employ only machinists in good standing with the International Association of Machinists; and that no piece work or premium system, a system which was in vogue in the plaintiff's factory, should be allowed. The plaintiff refused to sign the proposed contract, and on the eleventh day of April the defendant union ordered a strike and ordered all members of its Lodge No. 93, who were in the employment of the plaintiff, to leave its factory in a body, and in obedience to such order the members of the defendant union on that day quit the plaintiff's employment. That at that time the plaintiff had in its employ over one hundred men, some sixty of whom were members of the defendant union. That the greater portion of the other employes of the plaintiff, who were not members of the union, left with the strikers. That the plaintiff thereafter, with such men as could be secured from Rochester and other places, and such of its employes as remained, has since attempted to continue its business."

Nash, J., further said (41 Misc. 332):

"The defendants concede that prior to the granting of the injunction members of the union were stationed in and about the plaintiff's factory, morning, noon and night, when men employed by the plaintiff were going and coming from their work, for the purpose of persuading, and that they did persuade and endeavor to get the persons employed by the plaintiff, who had taken the places of the strikers, to leave the employment of the plaintiff. And it is insisted upon this motion that defendants have that right, and that they may by advice and persuasion induce the plaintiff's employees to leave the employment of the plaintiff. In other words, deprive the plaintiff of the means of carrying on its business, unless it accedes to the demands of the defendant. There is no question of wages involved in the strike. The plaintiff was paying its employes full union wages. The strike was ordered because the plaintiff refused to sign an agreement that it would not employ any but members of the union, and refuse to discard the premium system in its factory.

"It has not yet been held by the Courts of our State and I am not prepared to hold, that a business carried on in a lawful way may be so interfered with, merely because its owner refuses the dictation of the labor union as to the method in which the business shall be conducted or carried on. What means when assembled and co-operating together persons employed in any calling, trade or handicraft, may adopt, for the purpose of obtaining an advance in the rate of wages or compensation, or of maintaining such rate, under the provisions of the Penal Code, has not been fully defined. In one respect it has been found necessary to modify the provisions of the Code as to the right impliedly given. An amendment has been enacted which provides that a person who, either by himself, or with another, obstructs or annoys a member of the National Guard, or his employer, in respect of his trade, business or employment, because said member of said National Guard is such member, is guilty of a misdemeanor.

"In the case of Curran v. Galen, 152 N. Y. 33, it is held that, 'The organization or co-operation of workingmen is not of itself against any public policy, and must be regarded as having the sanction of law, when it is for such legitimate purpose as that of obtaining an advance in the rate of wages or compensation, or of maintaining such rate.' "

The Court in rendering its decision there said:

" 'In the general consideration of the subject, it must be premised that the organization, or the co-operation, of workingmen, is not against any public policy. Indeed, it must be regarded as having the sanction of law, when it is for such legitimate purposes as that of obtaining an advance in the rate of wages or compensation, or of maintaining such rate. Penal Code, § 170. It is proper and praiseworthy, and, perhaps, falls within that general view of human society, which perceives an underlying law that men should unite to achieve that which each by himself cannot achieve; or can achieve less readily. But the social principle which justifies such organizations is departed from, when they are so far extended in their operation as either to intend, or to accomplish, injury to others. Public policy and the interests of society favor the utmost freedom in the citizen to pursue his lawful trade or calling, and if the purpose of an organization or combination of workingmen be to hamper, or to restrict, that freedom, and, through contracts or arrangements with employers, to coerce other workingmen to become members of the organization and to come under its rules and conditions, under the penalty of the loss of their position, and of deprivation of employment, then that purpose seems clearly unlawful and militates against the spirit of our government and the nature of our institutions.'

" 'In the course of its opinion the Court cited with approval the case of Regina v. Rowlands, 17 Ad. & El. (N. S.) 671, where the Court of Queen's Bench, upon motion for a new trial for misdirection of the jury by Mr. Justice Erle, below, approved of his charge, in which he instructed the jury that 'a combination for the purpose of injuring another is a combination of a different nature, directed personally against the party to be injured, and the law allowing them to combine * * * gives no sanction to combinations which have for their immediate purpose the hurt of another. The rights of workingmen are conceded; but the exercise of free will and freedom of action within the limits of the law is also secured equally to the masters. The intention of the law is, at present. to allow either of them to follow the dictates of their own will with respect to their own actions, and their own property, and either, I believe, has the right to study to promote his own advantage, or to combine with others to promote their mutual advantage.'

injury merely to the business of another, without any pecuniary advantage to the persons so combining may be unlawful.

"The English case is in point. There the question involved was of the right by combination to prevent certain workingmen from working for their employers, and thereby to compel the latter to make an alteration in the mode of conducting their business, precisely the question here, the object of the defendant being to compel the plaintiff to change its method of business in such a manner as will conform to the requirements of the defendant union not in the matter of wages. It seems that the common-law right of action for enticing away from the master a servant has not been taken away, unless possibly for the purpose of obtaining an advance in or maintaining the rate of wages; hence when the rights of the master are unlawfully interfered with and there is not an adequate remedy at law, equity will take jurisdiction by injunction."

"The jurisdiction of a court of equity to enjoin interferences with property rights is not destroyed by the fact that they are accompanied by or are violations of the criminal law."

In re Debs et al. (1895). 158 U. S. 564. 39 L. ed. 1092. 15 S. C. 900.

Actions at law against the defendants for damages would be inadequate; a multiplicity of suits would be required.

Actions at law against employes who might break their contracts and join the Union would also be inadequate; and a multiplicity of suits against them would also be required.

IX.

WHEN IT IS THE DUTY OF A FEDERAL COURT SITTING IN A STATE TO ADOPT THE CONSTRUCTION BY THE HIGHEST COURT OF THAT STATE OF A CONTRACT MADE AND TO BE PERFORMED WITHIN IT.

Since its foundation it has been the settled law of this Court that a Federal Court sitting in a State must—in construing contracts made and to be performed within it, "when not controlled by the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States, or by the principles of the commercial or mercantile law or of general jurisprudence, of national or universal application"—adopt the construction put upon such contracts by the decisions of the highest court of such State. After redefining that doctrine in Hartford Fire Ins. Co. v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co., 175 U. S. 91, 100, this Court rested it upon Elmendorf v. Taylor, 10 Wheat. 152, 159; Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet. 519, 594; Vidal v. Philadelphia, 2 How. 127, 197; Bucher v. Cheshire R. Co., 125 U. S. 555, 581; Detroit v. Osborne, 135 U. S. 492, 498, 499; Union Nat. Bank v. Bank of Kansas City, 136 U. S. 223, 235; Etheridge v. Sperry, 139 U. S. 266, 276, 277; Gardner v. Michigan C. R. Co., 150 U. S. 349, 357; Bamberger v. Schoolfield, 160 U. S. 149, 159; Missouri, K. & T. Trust Co. v. Krumseig, 172 U. S. 351; Sioux City Terminal R. & Warehouse Co. v. Trust Co. of N. A., 173 U. S. 99. In Vidal v. Philadelphia, 2 How. 127, 197, this Court, in accepting the construction put upon a will by the Court of Pennsylvania, said: "But the very point of the positive existence of the law of charities in Pennsylvania has been (as already stated) fully recognized and enforced in the State courts of Pennsylvania, as far as their remedial process would enable these courts to act. This is abundantly established in the cases cited at the bar, and especially by the case of Witman v. Lex (17 Serg. & Rawle. 88), and that of Sarah Zane's will, before Mr. Justice Baldwin and Judge Hopkinson. In the former case, the Court said 'that it is immaterial whether the person to take be in esse, or not. * * *' The case, then, according to our judgment, is completely closed in by the principles and authorities already mentioned, and is that of a valid charity in Pennsylvania, unless it is rendered void by the remaining objection which has been taken to it." That case came here by appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States, sitting as a court of equity, for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania. Under the certiorari granted in this case, this Court has the same control over this record that it had in Vidal v. Girard, and the same obligation to enforce the construction of the contract invoked as fixed by the decision of the highest court of West Virginia.

In Burgess v. Seligman, 107 U. S. 20, this Court, in announcing the same principle, said: "Since the ordinary administration of the law is carried on by the State Courts, it necessarily happens that by the course of their decisions certain rules are established which become rules of property and action in the State, and have all the effect of law, and which it would be wrong to disturb. This is especially true with regard to the law of real estate and the construction of State Constitutions and Statutes. Such established rules are always regarded by the Federal Courts, no less than by the State Courts themselves, as authoritative declarations of what the law is." This Court then added that "When contracts and transactions have been entered into and rights have accrued thereon, under a particular state of the decisions, or when there has been no decision of the State tribunals," the Federal Courts, "even in such cases, for the sake of harmony and to avoid confusion * * * will lean towards an agreement of views with the State courts if the question seems to them balanced with doubt." In Bucher v. Cheshire R. Co., 125 U. S. 555, this Court said: "It may be said generally that whenever the decisions of the State courts relate to some law of a local character, which may have become established by those courts, or has always been a part of the law of the State, that the decisions upon the subject are usually conclusive, and always entitled to the highest respect of the Federal Courts. The whole of this subject has recently been very ably reviewed in the case of Burgess v. Seligman, 107 U. S. 20. Where such local law or custom has been established by repeated decisions of the highest courts of a State it becomes also the law governing the courts of the United States sitting in that State." In Union National Bank v. Bank of Kansas City, 136 U. S 223, involving the construction of a deed of trust made under the law of Missouri, it was said: "The question of the construction and effect of a statute of a State, regulating assignments for the benefit of creditors, is a question upon which the decisions of the highest court of the State, establishing a rule of property, are of controlling authority in the courts of the United States. Brashear v. West, 7 Pet. 608, 615; Allen v. Massey, 17 Wall. 351; Lloyd v. Fulton, 91 U. S. 479, 485; Sumner v. Hicks, 2 Black. 532, 534; Jaffray v. McGhee, 107 U. S. 361, 365; Peters v. Bain, 133 U. S. 670, 686; Jencks v. Quidnick Co. 135 U. S. 457. * * * In the present case there can be no doubt that the deed of trust, conveying the personal property of the partnership to secure the payment of its debts therein named and reserving in the clearest terms a right of redemption to the grantors, by providing that if they shall pay those debts the deed shall be void, as well as by authorizing the trustee to sell the property only in case of their failing to pay those debts or any part thereof for five days after they become payable, was, according to the settled course of decision in the courts of the State of Missouri, a mortgage only, and not an assignment under the Statute relied on; and therefore, according to the decisions in Missouri, cited at the beginning of this opinion (no fraud being proved or suggested), an instrument which one partner had the inherent authority to bind the partnership by, although his co-partners did not join it." That case came to this Court by appeal from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Missouri; and because that Circuit Court followed the decisions of the highest court of that State, as to the construction of the contract in question, its decree was affirmed.

In Etheridge v. Sperry, Watt and Garver, 139 U. S. 266, it was held that each State has the right to determine for itself the validity and construction of a chattel mortgage executed therein, and this Court will accept the settled law of each State as decisive on that subject. In its opinion in that case, this Court said:

> "From these decisions and others running through a period of thirty years, there can be no doubt as to the settled law of the State, and as to the law established, as was said by the Supreme Court, in Meyer v. Gage, supra, mainly at least from a construction of the State statutes. Can such a settled construction be ignored by this Court, and the judgment of the highest court of the State be reversed on error in a matter depending partially at least upon the construction of State statutes? It would be strange, indeed, if this Court should adjudge that there was error on the part of the Supreme Court of a State in following its own rulings, uniform and undisturbed for a quarter of a century. The matter is not one of purely general commercial law."

In Bamberger, Bloom & Co. v. Schoolfield, 160 U. S. 149, was involved the validity of a certain contract of sale of personal property; and the Court charged that "the mere intention of the vendor to defraud his other creditors by giving a preference to one would not render the sale invalid."

This Court said:

> "The correctness of these instructions depends necessarily upon the law of Alabama as interpreted and construed by the Supreme Court of that State, whose rulings in this regard will be followed here. Union Nat. Bank v. Bank of Kansas City, 136 U. S. 233; Peters v. Bain, 133 U. S. 670. It was in consonance with this rule that in a given case we enforced the law of the State of Illinois (White v. Cotzhausen, 129 U. S. 329), and in another, that of the State of Iowa (Etheridge v. Sperry, 139 U. S. 267). The instructions given as above recited were in direct accord with the settled law of Alabama."

In Missouri, Kansas & Texas Trust Co. v. Krumseig, 172 U. S. 351, this Court said:

> "The question in Brine v. Hartford F. Insurance Co., 96 U. S. 627, was whether a State statute which allowed to the mortgagor twelve months to redeem, after a sale under a decree of foreclosure, and to his creditor three months after that, conferred a substantial right; and it was so held, and that such right of redemption after sale was as obligatory on the Federal Courts sitting in equity as on the State courts; and that their rules of practice must be made to conform to the law of the State so far as may be necessary to give full effect to the right. The opinion of the Court was delivered by Mr. Justice Miller, who said: * * *
> "'And that all the laws of a State existing at the time a mortgage or any other contract is made, which affect the rights of the parties to the contract, enter into and become a part of it, and are obligatory on all courts which assume to give remedy on such contracts.'"

In Sioux City Terminal R. & W. Co. v. Trust Company of North America, 173 U. S. 99 this Court said:

> "As the claim that the bonds were void is based on the statutory provisions above referred to, it follows that we are compelled to primarily ascertain the meaning and operation of the State law. In making this inquiry we are constrained in that first place to inquire what construction has been placed upon the Iowa statute by the Supreme Court of the State; for it is an elementary principle that this Court in interpreting a State statute, will construe and apply it as settled by the Court of last resort of the State, and will, hence, only form an independent judgment as to the meaning of the State law when there was no binding construction of such State statute by the Court of last resort of the State. Nobles v. Georgia, 168 U. S. 398; First National Bank v. Chehalis County, 166 U. S. 440; Morley v. Lake Shore & M. S. Railway Co. 146 U. S. 166, and authorities there cited.

" * * * Whether, as an independent question, if we were enforcing the Iowa statute, we would decide that the issue of bonds by a corporation in excess of a statutory inhibition was not void, but merely voidable, need not be considered, since, as we have said, in applying an Iowa law, we follow the settled construction given to it by the Supreme Court of that State."

And in the case of the Baltimore & Ohio Southwestern Railway Company v. Voight (1900), 176 U. S. 498, 505, 44 L. Ed. 560, 565, 20 S. C. 385, Mr. Justice Shiras, in delivering the opinion of the Supreme Court, said:

"It must not be forgotten that the right of private contract is no small part of the liberty of the citizen, and that the usual and most important function of courts of justice is rather to maintain and enforce contracts than to enable parties thereto to escape from their obligation on the pretext of public policy, unless it clearly appear that they contravene public right or the public welfare. It was well said by Sir George Jessel, M. R., in Printing & N. Registering Co. v. Sampson, L. R. 19 Eq. 465: 'It must not be forgotten that you are not to extend arbitrarily those rules which say that a given contract is void > as being against public policy, because if there is one thing which more than another public policy requires it is that men of full age and competent understanding shall have the utmost liberty of contracting, and that their contracts, when entered into freely and voluntarily, shall be held sacred, and shall be enforced by courts of justice. Therefore, you have this paramount public policy to consider—that you are not lightly to interfere with this freedom of contract.'"

Prior to the execution of the contracts with its employees, upon which the rights of Petitioner depend, the highest Court of the State of West Virginia had settled, in the cases of State v. Goodwill, 33 W. Va. 179, and Thacker Coal & Coke Co. v. Burke et als., 59 W. Va. 253, the rules of law governing the construction and enforcement of such contracts. Such contracts were made upon the basis of the rules of law explicitly settled in those cases, which rules, in the language of this Court, speaking through Mr. Justice Miller, in Brine v. Hartford F. Insurance Co., 96 U. S. 627, "affect the rights of the parties to the contract, enter into and become a part of it, and are obligatory on all courts which assume to give remedy on such contracts."

In obedience to the rule, regulating the application of State law, Mr. Justice Dayton, sitting in the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of West Virginia, applied the law as settled by the highest court of West Virginia to the contracts in question

In its effort to keep in position to be able to run a non-union mine, the Hitchman Company had contracted with each of its employes along certain lines, and the net result was embodied in the following memorandum card:

> "I am employed by and work for the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company with the express understanding that I am not a member of the United Mine Workers of America and will not become so while > an employe of the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company, and that the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company is run non-union and agrees with me that it will run non-union while I am in its employ. If at any time while I am employed by the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company I want to become connected with the United Mine Workers of America, or any affiliated organization, I agree to withdraw from the employment of said company, and agree that while I am in the employ of that company I will not make any effort amongst its employes to bring about the unionizing of that mine against the company's wish. I have either read the above, or heard same read."

> Hitchman Coal & Coke Co. v. Mitchell, 202 Fed. 512, 553.

The District Court of the United States for the Northern District of West Virginia held that this was a lawful contract.

> "An employer and its employes may lawfully contract with respect to the terms of the employment, and as incidental thereto that the employes shall not join a labor union and the employer shall not employ union men; and, when such a contract has been made, a combination between officers or members of the labor union to induce either party to violate the contract, with which they have no rightful concern, constitutes an unlawful conspiracy, to restrain the carrying out of which the other party is entitled to an injunction."
> Hitchman Coal & Coke Co. v. Mitchell et al. (Circuit Court, N. D. West Virginia. September 21, 1909.) 172 Fed. 963, Syl. 2.

The decree thus rendered by the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of West Virginia is in perfect harmony with the local law of West Virginia as settled by its highest court; and is in perfect harmony with the general law as settled by the judgments of this court. We, therefore, respectfully insist that this Court, with the full record before it, should now make such an order or decree as will enforce the final decree perpetuating the injunction, rendered by said District Court for the Northern District of West Virginia on January 18, 1913.

THE JUDGMENT OF THE CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE FOURTH CIRCUIT DEPRIVES PETITIONER OF THE FREEDOM OF CONTRACT GUARANTEED TO IT BY THE FIFTH AMENDMENT.

Petitioner's Rights.

In considering how far the rights of the Hitchman Company can be said to be protected by the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment, the following language taken from 9 F. S. A. page 303, and the case cited there as authority for the proposition there advanced, show that it is correct to claim on behalf of the Hitchman Company that the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit professing to state and to apply the common law of West Virginia upon the subject of contract [but really misapplying West Virginia law, as that law is declared to be by the Supreme Court of Appeals of that State in the case of Thacker Coal & Coke Company v. Burke (1906), 59 W. Va. 253; 53 S. E. 161; 8 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 885] violates the rights of the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company as guaranteed to it by the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

> "14. Giving Unwarranted Effect to Decision of State Court.—A judgment of the Circuit Court of the United States claiming to give such unwarranted effect to a decision of a State court as to wrongfully deprive a party of his property, may be considered as presenting a question how far it can be sustained in view of the prohibitory language of this clause."

> Fayerweather v. Ritch (1904), 195 U. S. 208.

A later discussion of the doctrine announced in Fayerweather v. Ritch will be found in the case of Hannah O'Callaghan et al. v. Terence O'Brien, admr., etc. et als. (1905), 199 U. S. 89, 50 L. ed. 101, 25 S. C. 727. (Officially reported under the title of "Farrell v. O'Brien.")

The case of Hovey against Elliott, decided by the Supreme Court of the United States (1897), 167 U. S. 409, 42 L. ed. 215, disposes of the question as to whether the decision of the Federal Court can be said to violate rights of a citizen guaranteed to him by the due process clause of Amendment Five to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. Justice White delivering the opinion of the Court, in speaking on that particular point, says:

> "If the legislative department of the Government were to enact a statute conferring the right to condemn the citizen without any opportunity whatever of being heard, would it be pretended that such an enactment would not be violative of the Constitution? If this be true, as it undoubtedly is, how can it be said that the judicial department, the source and fountain of justice itself, has yet the authority to render lawful that which if done under express legislative sanction would be violative of the Constitution. If such power obtains, then the judicial department of the government sitting to uphold and enforce the Constitution is the only one possessing a power to disregard it. If such authority exists then in consequence of their establishment, to compel obedience to law and to enforce justice, courts possess the right to inflict the very wrongs which they were created to prevent."
> Hovey v. Elliott, (Decided May 24, 1897), 167 U. S. 409, 417, 42 L. ed. 215, 221.

It seems perfectly clear, therefore, that the due process clause of Amendment Five restrains the judicial as well as the executive branches of the Federal Government, and, therefore, the rights of the Hitchman Company may be said to have been violated by the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, which takes away from petitioner a property right vested in it by contract as construed by the highest court of the State of West Virginia.

Plaintiff's contention upon this point is stated under three heads:

1. Chicago Agreement of 1898 and the efforts of defendants to carry it out.

(a) By the Chicago Agreement of 1898 the defendants conspired with Union operators, competitors of West Virginia operators and of operators of other States, to substantially restrain or suppress coal mining in West Virginia, and in the fulfillment of that contract caused the plaintiff to suffer loss and damage by reason of the unionizing of its mine April 1, 1903, and by reason of its operations under coerced contracts with the Union to June 12, 1906, whereby in operating time the plaintiff lost 164 days and $48,742 in money.

(b) Through the adoption of Resolution No. 8 by the 1907 Convention of Sub-District 5 of District No. 6 of the United Mine Workers of America the defendants caused loss and damage to the plaintiff by reason of its inability, owing to organizing efforts, to fulfill its contracts for lake coal in the summer and fall of 1907, and are about to cause the plaintiff to suffer incalculable loss and damage by reason of their announced intention to proceed again to unionize the Hitchman mine, if the injunction now forbidding it were out of the way.

(c) Through induced breaches of contracts, existing between the plaintiff and its employees, known to the defendants, and with which they have no concern, defendants have caused plaintiff to suffer great loss and damage through its inability to comply with its contracts for lake coal during the summer and fall of 1907, and are about to cause plaintiff to suffer incalculable loss and damage through their efforts to unionize plaintiff's mine, which they propose to again attempt, providing the injunction now restraining them can be gotten out of the way.

2. The United Mine Workers are an oppressive monopoly and seek absolute control of all labor in the coal mining industry.

(a) Owing to this purpose the United Mine Workers entered into the Chicago Agreement of 1898.

(b) In pursuit of the same purpose they passed Resolution No. 8 at the 1907 Convention of Sub-District 5 of District 6.

(c) And likewise they undertook to induce breaches of contracts of employment between plaintiff and plaintiff's employees, which were known to them, and with which they had no concern, and they propose to continue to breach these contracts until plaintiff shall submit to them and unionize its mine, provided the injunction now preventing that course of action on their part can be gotten rid of.

3. If the effort of the United Mine Workers to get all men working in and about each mine to join their Union is lawful, still they may not exercise that right in such a way as will be inconsistent with, or as will destroy the constitutional right, of equal dignity, of the employer, and in this case the right of the Hitchman Company, to contract with its employees upon such terms as may be agreed upon between it and its employees. Neither may they make use of their right to organize in such a manner as will be inconsistent with, or as will interfere with or destroy such contracts between the employer and employee, and in this case between the Hitchman Company and its employees, with which contracts the defendants have no concern.

"Society itself is an organization, and does not object to organizations for social, religious, business, and all legal purposes. The law, therefore, recognizes the right of workingmen to unite and to invite others to join their ranks, thereby making available the strength, influence, and power that come from such association. By virtue of this right, powerful labor unions have been organized.

"But the very fact that it is lawful to form these bodies with multitudes of members, means that they have thereby acquired a vast power, in the presence of which the individual may be helpless. This power, when unlawfully used against one, cannot be met, except by his purchasing peace at the cost of submitting to terms which involve the sacrifice of rights protected by the Constitution; or by standing on such rights, and appealing to the preventive powers of a court of equity. When such appeal is made, it is the duty of government to protect the one against the many, as well as the many against the one."

(d) Labor unions may be unlawful.

In the case of Coppage v. Kansas, decided January 25, 1915, 236 U. S. 1, this Court said:

> "Of course we do not intend to say, nor to intimate, anything inconsistent with the right of individuals to join labor unions, nor do we question the legitimacy of such organizations so long as they conform to the laws of the land as others are required to do."

But even as to this, the Court added this significant qualification:

> "And we have no reference to questions of monopoly, or interference with the rights of third parties or the general public. These involve other considerations, respecting which we intend to intimate no opinion. See Curran v. Galen, 152 N. Y. 33, 37 L. R. A. 802, 57 Am. St. Rep. 496; 46 N. E. 297; Jacobs v. Cohen, 183 N. Y. 207, 213, 214; 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 292; 111 Am. St. Rep. 730; 76 N. E. 5; 5 Ann. Cas. 280; Plant v. Woods, 176 Mass. 492; 51 L. R. A. 339; 79 Am. St. Rep. 330; 57 N. E. 1011; Berry v. Donovan, 188 Mass. 353; 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 899; 108 Am. St. Rep. 499; 74 N. E. 603; 3 Ann. Cas. 738; Brennan v. United Hatters, 73 N. J. L. 729, 738; 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 254; 118 Am. St. Rep. 727; 65 Atl. 165, 169; 9 Ann. Cas. 698, 702."

The cases referred to in this last quotation from Coppage v. Kansas hold, as follows:

"An agreement between a labor association and an employers' association, that all employees of the members of the latter association shall be members of the former association, and that no employee shall work for a longer period than four weeks without becoming a member, is illegal and constitutes no defense to an action for conspiracy by an employee who is discharged in pursuance of such agreement because of his refusal to become a member of the labor association."

Curran v. Galen (1897), 152 N. Y. 33; 37 L. R. A. 802.

"A contract by a manufacturer to employ as laborers none but members of a particular labor union is not void as against public policy."

Jacobs v. Cohen (1905), 183 N. Y. 207; 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 292.

"Members of a labor union are entitled to an injunction restraining the members of another union from which they have withdrawn from doing acts in pursuance of a conspiracy to compel their reinstatement, by appeals to their employers to induce them to rejoin and to discharge them in case of refusal, accompanied by threats intimating results detrimental to the employer's business and property in case of a failure to comply, coercive in effect upon the will, although they committed no acts of personal violence or physical injury to property, where complainants have been injured by such acts, and there is reason to believe that further proceedings of the same kind are contemplated which will result in still more injury to them."

Plant v. Woods (1900), 176 Mass. 492; 51 L. R. A. 339.

"A contract between an employer and a labor union obligating the employer to retain in his employ no one objectionable to the union for any cause does not of itself justify interference with a workman's employment by the one who secured the contract on behalf of the union.

"Whether or not interference with a laborer's employment under a contract between a labor union and an employer, obligating the employer to retain no one in his employ who was objectionable to the union, was for a justifiable cause, is a question for the jury.

"Interference by a combination of persons to obtain the discharge of a workman because he refuses to comply with their wishes and join a union for their advantage cannot be justified as a part of the competition of workmen with one another.

"The purpose of strengthening itself in future contests with the employer will not justify a labor union in interfering with the contracts of non-union workmen for the purpose of compelling them to join the union.

"The attempt to force all laborers to combine in unions is against the policy of the law because aiming at monopoly.

"The right of a laborer to recover damages for wrongful interference with his contract of employment is not affected by the fact that it was terminable at will, instead of ending at a stated time."

Berry v. Donovan (1905), 188 Mass. 353; 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 899.

"Plaintiff was a member of a trade union (a voluntary association), whose rules provided for fining and otherwise punishing any member violating the laws of the association or the rules of trade. The rules provided for a trial of the accused member before a tribunal established within the association, at the same time providing that he should be entitled to 'due notice and a fair trial,' and should not be put on trial unless charges were submitted in writing by a member of the association. Plaintiff, having been put on trial without the submission of written charges and without due notice, was sentenced to pay a fine and to give up his place of employment for one year. Held, that this course of procedure, unless consented to by plaintiff, furnished no justification for the subsequent action of the association and its officers in procuring his discharge from employment.

"Whether plaintiff did consent to be put on trial without charges or notice was, under the evidence in this case, a question for the jury.

"The Constitution of this State (article 1, par. 1) establishes the inalienable right of all men to acquire property and pursue and obtain safety and happiness. Included in this is the right of making contracts for personal service as a means of acquiring property. It is therefore the right of every man to engage in such lawful business or occupation as he may choose, free from hindrance or obstruction by his fellow men, saving such as may result from the exercise of equal or superior rights on their part.

"Whoever intentionally and without legal justification or excuse procures an employer to discharge his employee, to the damage of the latter, is liable to an action for damages at the suit of the employee; and this, although there was no binding contract of employment.

"Malice, in the law, is the intentional doing of a wrongful act, without justification or excuse. A 'wrongful act,' within the meaning of this definition, is any act which in the ordinary course will infringe upon the rights of another, to his damage, except it be done in the exercise of an equal or superior right."

Brennan v. United Hatters (1906), 73 N. J. L. 729; 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 254.

Second.

Upon the subject of the Chicago Agreement of 1898, the Circuit Court of Appeals says:

"A fair interpretation of the evidence shows that it was the purpose of the defendants to induce the miners of West Virginia to become members of the organization, and thereby secure as high wages as possible, compatible with the successful operation of the mines of that State by the respective owners. They had a perfect right to form a combination to accomplish such purposes by peaceable and lawful methods, and so long as they refrained from resorting to unlawful measures to effectuate the same they could not be said to be engaged in a conspiracy to unionize plaintiff's mine.

"As we have already stated, the evidence fails to show that any unlawful methods were resorted to by these defendants in this instance. Therefore, the court erred in holding the organization to be unlawful upon the theory that it was guilty of a conspiracy."

Record, p. 736, l. 21–34.

IN REACHING THIS CONCLUSION, THE CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS ERRED AGAIN, IN THE LIGHT OF THE FACTS, AND IN THE LAW APPLICABLE THERETO.

The Chicago Agreement of 1898 turned out in practice to be what it was intended to be when made. It was an oppressive combination entered into between the United Mine Workers organization and the Union operators of the Central Competitive States, for a consideration passing between them, whereby the United Mine Workers were to unionize the State of West Virginia, for the purpose of substantially restraining or suppressing coal mining in West Virginia, to the end that the competition, theretofore existing between the non-union operators of West Virginia and the Union operators, the other parties to the Chicago Agreement of 1898, might be brought to an end.

That continuous efforts were made by the United Mine Workers' organization to carry out its part of the Chicago Agreement, and to unionize all the mines of West Virginia, is admitted by William Green, one of the defendants, now Secretary-Treasurer of the National Organization, in a statement made by him in the 1910 Joint Convention of the United Mine Workers and Union Operators of the Central Competitive States.

We quote Mr. Green's language as it appears on page 668 of the Record, beginning with line 12:

> "Let me point to the fact that the United Mine Workers of America have diligently and aggressively attempted to carry out the promise made in Chicago in 1898; that they have done everything in their power to redeem any promise they may have made to organize West Virginia. Since 1898 our organization has at various times spent hundreds of thousands of dollars trying to unionize West Virginia. We have also sacrificed human life in the attempt to redeem that promise. In view of the fact that we have spent hundreds of thousands of dollars and that our organizers, our members who have gone there as missionaries in an attempt to redeem that promise have sacrificed their lives and their liberties, we should be given credit for what we have done. I want to ask the operators how much money they have spent and what they have done to aid us to organize West Virginia."
> Record, p. 668, l. 12–25.

Third.

As to Resolution No. 8 the Circuit Court of Appeals is silent.

We quote from Record, page 742, beginning with line 39:

> "While it is not denied by the defendants that they sought by peaceable methods to induce those employed by the plaintiff to join the union, yet they stoutly contend that at no time since the mine has been operated as a non-union mine have they employed unlawful methods. We fail to find that there is sufficient legal evidence to show that the defendants entered into a conspiracy or combination for the purpose of unionizing the plaintiff's mine. While there was evidence admitted by the Court below as to statements made by certain officials of the United Mine Workers of America, and the coal operators of Pennsylvania and other States, bearing upon this question, yet there is no evidence to show that the United Mine Workers of America combined, or formed themselves into a conspiracy for the purpose of unionizing plaintiff's mines after it started to run its mine non-union in June, 1906."

Record, p. 742, l. 39–50.
Record, p. 743, l. 1, 2.

IN REACHING THIS CONCLUSION THE CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS ERRED AGAIN IN THE LIGHT OF THE FACTS, AND IN THE LAW APPLICABLE THERETO.

We quote from the report of the Secretary-Treasurer Lee Rankin, one of the defendants, in his report to the 1907 Convention of Sub-District 5 of District 6:

"We have one mine at Bellaire, Ohio, and five mines in the Pan Handle District which I believe should be organized. I believe those mines can be organized and in my opinion this convention should adopt some plan to organize those mines."

Report of Secretary-Treasurer Lee Rankin, p. 10, l. 34–38.
(Original document transmitted to U. S. Supreme Court.)

Record, p. 414, l. 21–30.

"RESOLUTION NO. 8.

"Whereas, there are mines in the Panhandle District and Ohio that are not organized, and believing every mine should be organized; be it

"Resolved, by this ninth annual convention that the sub-district officers together with the district officers be authorized to take up the work of organizing every mine in the sub-district as quickly as it can be done."

Record, p. 414, l. 35–42.

Fourth.

In holding that the defendants have a lawful right to induce plaintiff's employees to join their Union, provided that in inducing them to join they do not use coercion, threats, intimidation or violence for the purpose, the Circuit Court of Appeals for one ground, says:

> "If the plaintiff may for the purpose of protecting its interests adopt a policy by which only non-union men can secure employment at its mines, and such conduct be sanctioned by the law, by what process of reasoning can it be held that the defendants may not adopt the same method in order to protect their interests?"
> Record, p. 731, l. 21–26.

IN REACHING THIS CONCLUSION, THE CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS ERRED AGAIN IN THE LIGHT OF THE FACTS, AND IN THE LAW APPLICABLE THERETO.

The plaintiff has a right to protect itself against the United Mine Workers by refusing to employ or to keep in its employ any member of that Union.

That is a reasonable rule which plaintiff finds necessary for the protection of its business.

In Howard v. Danner, the signed agreement was for the purpose of protecting that plaintiff against a competitor. Danner had been in the employ of the plaintiff, and, in breach of a contract he had made with the plaintiff, was then working for plaintiff's competitor. The agreement, which he broke, read as follows:

> "In consideration of your retaining my services as waiter at 4s. per week under the new management, with a week's notice on either side, I hereby agree that in case I should leave your service or be dismissed, I will not, during the year 1901, enter into the service of the new restaurant shortly to be opened at 62 Regent Street, and I further agree to pay for any breach of this agreement the sum of one pound for every day I may remain in the service of the new restaurant, as liquidated damages."

"A labor organization seeking to compel a manufacturer to unionize his plant is not such a competitor in the labor market as to justify it in enticing employes to leave the service of their master, or to induce persons seeking employment with him from so doing, when the enticer does not employ labor. The competition which the law upholds must be honest competition, and not a malicious attempt to injure another."

Geo. Jonas Glass Company v. Glass Bottle Blowers' Association of United States and Canada, et al. (1907) N. J. Eq. 66 Atl. 953.

It is not to the point to say that the United Mine Workers have absorbed all other labor organizations for the mining of coal.

Record, p. 542, l. 13–44.

Nor that it is the largest labor organization in the world.

Record, p. 569, l. 40–43.

Nor that it aims to organize every mine on the American Continent.

Record, p. 569, l. 48–52.
Record, pp. 570, 571, l. 1–15.
Record, p. 619, l. 12–14.

"The attempt to force all laborers to combine in unions is against the policy of the law because aiming at monopoly."

Berry v. Donovan (1905), 188 Mass. 353; 74 N. E. 603; 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 899; 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 738.

THEREFORE—

THE FACT THAT THE UNITED MINE WORKERS HAVE MADE THEMSELVES AN EXCLUSIVE, AGGRESSIVE, AND POWERFUL MONOPOLY CANNOT BE TURNED INTO A SHIELD TO PROTECT THEM. WRONGDOERS CANNOT PROFIT BY THEIR OWN WRONGS.

Fifth.

In holding that the defendants have a lawful right to induce plaintiff's employes to join their union provided that in inducing them to join they do not use coercion, threats, intimidation, or violence for the purpose, the Circuit Court of Appeals for another ground, says:

> "While it is true that the plaintiff has a perfect right to refuse to employ union labor, is it not equally true that union labor, as we have stated, may by the employment of legitimate means, do that which is necessary to keep its forces together?
> "Surely we have not reached the point when capital with its strong arm may adopt a plan like this for protecting its interests, while on the other hand the laboring classes are to be denied the protection of the law when they are attempting to assert rights that are just as important to their well-being as are the rights of those who have been more fortunate in accumulating wealth. He who 'seeks equity must do equity.' In other words he 'must come into court with clean hands.' If the courts of this country should by injunctive relief protect the mine owner in the enjoyment of his property rights, and restrain the laboring people from organizing their forces by declaring such organization unlawful, would not the mine owner then be in a position to control the situation so that he who has to toil for his daily bread would be placed in a position where if he exists at all, he must do so at such wages, and upon such terms as organized capital may see fit to dictate."

IN REACHING THIS CONCLUSION THE CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS ERRED AGAIN IN THE LIGHT OF THE FACTS, AND IN THE LAW APPLICABLE THERETO.

The injunction in the Hitchman case does not restrain the laboring people from organizing their forces, but simply requires them in so doing to conform to the laws of the land as others are required to do.

Coppage v. Kansas, 236 U. S. 1.

There is no strike and this is not a strike case.

The Hitchman Company has no dispute with its employes nor have they any dispute with it.

The Hitchman Company has no contractual or other business relations with the Union.

And there is no dispute between the Hitchman Company and the defendants, except what they themselves have intentionally brought about.

THIS DISPUTE, FORGED BY THEM AS A WEAPON TO STRIKE IN ILLEGITIMATE ATTACK, CANNOT BE TURNED INTO A SCREEN TO CONCEAL THE NATURE AND OBJECT OF THEIR COMBINATION.

In Adair v. United States, quoting from Mr. Cooley in his treatise on Torts, page 278, this Court says:

> "It is a part of every man's civil rights that he be left at liberty to refuse business relations with any person whomsoever, whether the refusal rests upon reason, or is the result of whim, caprice, prejudice or malice. With his reasons neither the public nor third persons have any legal concern. It is also his right to have business relations with anyone with whom he can make contracts, and, if he is wrongfully deprived of this right by others, he is entitled to redress."
> 208 U. S. 161–192 at p. 173; 52 L. Ed. 436–450, p. 442.

And again in reaffirming the Adair case, this Court says:

> "The constitutional right of the employer to discharge an employee because of his membership in a labor union being granted, can the employer be compelled to resort to this extreme measure? May he not offer to the employe an option, such as was offered in the instant case, to remain in the employment if he will retire from the union; to sever the former relationship only if he prefers the latter? Granted the equal freedom of both parties to the contract of employment, has not each party the right to stipulate upon what terms only he will consent to the inception, or to the continuance, of that relationship? And may he not insist upon an express agreement, instead of leaving the terms of the employment to be implied? Can the legislature in effect require either party at the beginning to act covertly; concealing essential terms of the employment—terms to which, perhaps, the other would not willingly consent —and revealing them only when it is proposed to insist upon them as a ground for terminating the relationship? Supposing an employer is unwilling to have in his employ one holding membership in a labor union, and has reason to suppose that the man may prefer membership in the union to the given employment without it—we ask, can the legislature oblige the employer in such case to refrain from dealing frankly at the outset? And is not the employer entitled to insist upon equal frankness in return? Approaching the matter from a somewhat different standpoint, is the employee's right to be free to join a labor union any more sacred, or more securely founded upon the Constitution, than his right to work for whom he will, or to be idle if he will? And does not the ordinary contract of employment include an insistence by the employer that the employe shall agree, as a condition of the employment, that he will not be idle and will not work for whom he pleases, but will serve his present employer, and him only, so long as the relation between them shall continue? Can the right of making contracts be enjoyed at all, except by parties coming together in an agreement that requires each party to forego, during the time and for the purpose covered by the agreement, any inconsistent exercise of his constitutional rights?

"These queries answer themselves. The answers, as we think, lead to a single conclusion: Under constitutional freedom of contract, whatever either party has the right to treat as sufficient ground for terminating the employment, where there is no stipulation on the subject, he has the right to provide against by insisting that a stipulation respecting it shall be a sine qua non of the inception of the employment, or of its continuance if it be terminable at will."

Sixth.

In holding that the defendants have a lawful right to induce plaintiff's employes to join their union, regardless of their contract with the plaintiff not to do so, provided that in inducing them to join, defendants do not use coercion, threats, intimidation or violence for the purpose, the Circuit Court of Appeals says:

"The contract in question is in the following language:

"'I am employed by and work for the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company with the express understanding that I am not a member of the United Mine Workers of America, and will not become so while an employee of the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company; that the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company is run non-union and agrees with me that it will run non-union while I am in its employ. If at any time while I am employed by the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company I want to become connected with the United Mine Workers of America, or any affiliated organization, I agree to withdraw from the employment of said Company, and agree that while I am in the employ of that company that I will not make any effort amongst its employees to bring about the unionizing of that mine against the company's wish. I have either read the above or heard the same read.'

"It will be observed that by the terms of the contract that either of the parties thereto may at will terminate the same, and while it is provided that so long as the employee continues to work for the plaintiff he shall not join this organization, nevertheless, there is nothing in the contract which requires such employees to work for any fixed or definite period. If at any time after employment any of them should decide to join the defendant organization, the plaintiff could not under the contract recover damages for a breach of the same. In other words, the employes under this contract may, if they deem proper, at any moment join a labor union, and the only penalty provided therefor is that they cannot secure further employment from the plaintiff. Therefore, under this contract, if the non-union men, or any of them, should see fit to join the United Mine Workers of America on account of lawful and persuasive methods on the part of the defendants, and as a result of such action on their part were to be discharged by the plaintiff, it could not maintain an action against them on account of such conduct on their part. Such being the case it would be unreasonable to hold that the action of the defendants would render the United Mine Workers of America liable in damages to the plaintiff because they had employed lawful methods to induce the non-union miners to become members of their organization.

"Under these circumstances we fail to see how this contract can be taken as a basis for restraining the defendants from using lawful methods for the purpose of inducing the parties to the contract to join the organization."

Record, p. 744, l. 35–50.
Record, p. 745, l. 1–26.

IN REACHING THIS CONCLUSION THE CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS ERRED AGAIN IN THE LIGHT OF THE FACTS, AND IN THE LAW APPLICABLE THERETO.

"When a man is called upon to agree not to become or remain a member of the Union while working for a particular employer, he is in effect only asked to deal openly and frankly with his employer, so as not to retain the employment upon terms to which the latter is not willing to agree. And the liberty of making contracts does not include a liberty to procure employment from an unwilling employer, or without a fair understanding. Nor may the employer be foreclosed by legislation from exercising the same freedom of choice that is the right of the employe.

"To ask a man to agree, in advance, to refrain from affiliation with the union while retaining a certain position of employment, is not to ask him to give up any part of his constitutional freedom. He is free to decline the employment on those terms, just as the employer may decline to offer employment on any other; for 'it takes two to make a bargain.' Having accepted employment on those terms, the man is still free to join the union when the period of employment expires; or, if employed at will, then at any time upon simply quitting the employment. And, if bound by his own agreement to refrain from joining during a stated period of employment, he is in no different situation from that which is necessarily incident to term contracts in general. For constitutional freedom of contract does not mean that a party is to be as free after making a contract as before; he is not free to break it without accountability. Freedom of contract, from the very nature of the thing, can be enjoyed only by being exercised; and each particular exercise of it involves making an engagement which, if fulfilled, prevents for the time any inconsistent course of conduct."

Coppage v. Kansas, 236 U. S. 1 at pages 20, 21.

EMPLOYMENT AT THE WILL OF THE PARTIES DOES NOT MAKE IT EMPLOYMENT AT THE WILL OF OTHERS.

"It is said that the bill does not show an employment for a term, and that under an employment at will the complainant could be discharged at any time for any reason or for no reason, the motive of the employer being immaterial. The conclusion, however, that is sought to be drawn is too broad. The fact that the employment is at the will of the parties, respectively, does not make it one at the will of others. The employe has manifest interest in the freedom of the employer to exercise his judgment without illegal interference or compulsion and, by the weight of authority the unjustified interference of third persons is actionable although the employment is at will. Moran v. Dunphy, 177 Mass. 485, 487; Berry v. Donovan, 188 Mass. 353; Brennan v. United Hatters, 73 N. XI.

IS THE LABOR ORGANIZATION KNOWN AS THE "UNITED MINE WORKERS OF AMERICA" AN UNLAWFUL ORGANIZATION?

Are the defendants engaged in a legitimate business?

Petitioner's bill has two objects, each of which is plainly expressed:

First.—To raise the point that the United Mine Workers of America is an unlawful organization, and as a corollary that all acts done by it or its representatives in pursuit of its objects are unlawful.

Second.—That specific acts charged as committed, and to be intended to be continued to be committed, unless restrained, violate plaintiff's constitutional rights.

Having disposed, in what precedes, of the second contention, an attempt will now be made to maintain the first.

In this case, the real point at issue is, may the defendants, as officers of the United Mine Workers of America, organize plaintiff's non-union mine, and for the purpose of getting in position to organize that mine, may they send organizers amongst plaintiff's men and induce them to become members of the Union where it appears that the men employed by plaintiff are employed with an express agreement that they shall not join the United Mine Workers of America while in plaintiff's employ, and where it further appears that these defendants, as officers of the Union, have knowledge of these contracts plaintiff's men have made with it, and have knowledge of the additional fact alleged in the bill that plaintiff has contracted with each of its employes that while so employed the plaintiff will continue to run its mine non-union.

Section 2 of Article 1 of the Constitution of District No. 6, United Mine Workers of America, in defining the objects of the United Mine Workers, says: "One of the objects of this organization is to unite ALL employes in and around the coal mines of Ohio and the Panhandle District of West Virginia."

And Section 3 of Article 1 of the Constitution of Sub-District 5 of District No. 6, United Mine Workers of America, says: "All men are eligible and must be members of the United Mine Workers of America who work in and around the mines." (Italics in this and in quotations following are ours.)

The proceedings of the National Convention of the United Mine Workers held at Indianapolis, January 15–22, 1907, show that the organization had a membership of 230,667 in 1906; that its income for the fiscal year ending November 30, 1906, was $1,081,408.32; its expenditures for the same period were $1,232,994.01, and that its balance on hand December 1, 1906, was $337,960.71.

The same proceedings of that Convention show that it is claimed for the United Mine Workers of America, that it is the largest labor organization in America.

From the proceedings of the Convention of Sub-District 5 of District 6, United Mine Workers of America, which was held at Wheeling, March 14–19, 1907, it appears that the paid up membership of District No. 6, United Mine Workers of America, was in 1906, 36,372, and that on March 1, 1907, Sub-District 5 of District 6, United Mine Workers of America, had 108 locals in good standing and a paid up membership of 12,500.

Indicative of the purpose of the Union are the following declarations of officials or delegates at the National Convention held at Indianapolis, January 15–22, 1907.

Speaking of organizing West Virginia and the unorganized sections of Pennsylvania, the defendant, Lewis, said: "We will organize them by a strike movement." Another delegate in his address at the same Convention, at the same time, said: "I agree with President Green and Vice-President Lewis that you never can get those men organized except at the end of a general strike, but I warn you not to go into it until you are thoroughly prepared." Another delegate, in addressing the Convention, at the same time, in the same discussion, while recommending and explaining organization, said: "If we are able at a colliery to force all the men to become members of the Union we do so. If we are too weak, we do not attempt it, but keep gradually working among the men until we are able to accomplish our end." The defendant, John Mitchell, in addressing the Convention, as President, said: "I believe it is possible, indeed I believe it is probable, that in the not distant future we will be able to inaugurate a movement in West Virginia and the other unorganized fields that will involve them in a strike, and then we will expect you to furnish the sinews of war, as you have done in the past, to keep these men in idleness." And he added, "If one year hence it is my judgment that a suspension of mining throughout the United States would be best, I will favor that policy."

Consider these Convention declarations in the light of the obligation of membership which is "As the mine workers of the entire country are competitors in the labor world, I promise to cease work at any time I am called upon by the organization to do so."

The United Mine Workers of America have been before the courts, State and Federal, many times, in one way or another. But the lawfulness of the entire organization, described on the membership card "United Mine Workers of America—one and indissoluble," has not been so specifically attacked, nor have that Union's unlawful purposes, its unlawful by-laws and its unlawful acts been so specifically shown as in this case now at the bar of this Court.

The Union's contentions and practices have, to a limited extent, from time to time, during some years past, been the subject of public discussion and condemnation, judicial and otherwise. But the case of United States v. Weber et al., 114 Fed. 950, is the only case which has come to our notice in which the United Mine Workers, as an organization, have been held to be unlawful because they are organized for an unlawful purpose—that is to say, to control all mining operations; hence to become and to be a monopoly in the supplying of labor in the coal mining industry. And this purpose has not been and is not now confined to bituminous coal, but embraces anthracite and all other kinds. Coal is one of the necessaries of life. With the enormous power which this organization has and wields in the enforcement of its varied and constantly enlarging demands, it periodically takes the operators by the throat, and to coerce them, it takes the country by the throat as well. The anthracite strike of 1902 is a sample. The contention then was for "recognition" of the Union, and inasmuch as the cause of controversy in this case now at the bar of this Court has for an underlying motive the same purpose, we will ask the Court to take judicial notice of the Anthracite Commission's Report, "Bulletin of the Department of Labor. No. 46. May, 1903."

That this Court may take judicial notice of that Report, we cite and rely upon Brown et al. v. Piper (1875), 1 Otto 37, 23 L. ed. 200, 201, 202, in which it was held—

> "Among the things of which judicial notice is taken, are:
> "The law of nations; the general customs and usages of merchants; the notary's seal; things which must happen according to the laws of nature; the coincidences of the days of the week with those of the month; the meaning of words in the vernacular language; the customary abbreviations of Christian names; the accession of the Chief Magistrate to office and his leaving it. In this country, such notice is taken of the appointment of members of the cabinet, the election and resignation of senators," etc. The case of Hoyt et al. v. Russell (1886), 117 U. S. 401, 29 L. ed. 914, 915, holds: "It is undoubtedly true that judicial notice is not taken of purely private concerns, when they are not connected with or necessarily involved in a matter of a public nature; but it is otherwise when they are so connected or involved."

In Ames et al. v. Union Pacific Railway Company et al., 62 Fed., on page 13, Judge Caldwell took judicial notice of facts disclosed by the report of the "Commission of the United States Pacific Railway Company," 1887.

While the Anthracite Commission held that the question of the recognition of the United Mine Workers of America was not within the scope of the jurisdiction conferred upon it by the submission, it is said in the Report on page 487:

> "The Commission feels, however, that it is incumbent upon it to give some expression to its views on the general question. From the correspondence which passed between the coal operators and the officers of the United Mine Workers prior to the strike, and which has been cited under the heading, 'History and causes of the strike,' from the voluminous testimony presented during the hearing before the Commission, and from the arguments of counsel and others, with which the public hearings closed, the Commission is led to the conviction that the question of the recognition of the union and of dealing with the mine workers through their union was considered by both operators and miners to be one of the most important involved in the controversy which culminated in the strike."

The Report then deals in a general way with the purposes of the United Mine Workers.

> "The order, as its name implies, is an organization to membership in which all workers who 'produce or handle coal or coke in or around the mines' are eligible. It claims a jurisdiction co-extensive with the coal producing industry in America. Its purposes, as stated in its Constitution (which is printed in full on pages 629 to 640) is to unite the mine workers and 'ameliorate' their condition by methods of conciliation, arbitration or strikes."

The Commission disapproved of the Constitution of the United Mine Workers, and said (page 491):

> "The present constitution of the United Mine Workers of America does not present the most inviting inducements to the operators to enter into contractual relations with it."

And, with respect to the settlement of grievances, which might be passed upon arbitrarily, and be finally disposed of by the Union's side, regardless of the other side, or of real justice, and with respect to strikes, which by similar arbitrary action, regardless of the other side of the controversy, and of real justice, might be declared by the Union, to the great and unnecessary damage of the employer, the Commission held that the principle of Article X of the Union's Constitution was wrong, as its application violated reasonable rules for the adjustment of difficulties between employers and employes wherein the grievance should be considered by the parties immediately concerned, to-wit, by the employer and his employe; while if the matter involved happened to be of great scope and too large to be so settled and adjusted by immediate dealings between the employes and employer, that such grievance should be then referred to a higher power in the shape of one body to be made up of two other bodies representing the entire mining region affected by the decision of the question, the two bodies to be equally divided in numbers, representative of the employes on the one hand, and of the employers on the other hand, with a proviso that, upon their failing to agree, the question to be decided should then be referred to an umpire, whose decision should be final and binding in the premises.

Article X contained four sections, and sections 1, 3 and 4 of Article X of the present Constitution are quoted in the bill. On comparison they are found to be the same in 1907 as the Commission found and condemned them in 1902. Meanwhile, however, the United Mine Workers had reached out for more power and had created out of themselves a new and higher body, the International Union, and the word "International" therefore displaces the word "National" in those sections as they now exist. But the United Mine Workers stuck to their iniquitous provisions, and did not mend their ways.

The Commission, in making its decision, did not say whether the United Mine Workers were a lawful or an unlawful organization. All the Commission had before it on the question of the purpose of the Union to control all mining operations was embraced in Section 2 of Article 1, Constitution U. M. W. of A. Appendix F. Report, page 630. "The objects of this Union are to unite mine employes that produce or handle coal or coke in or around the mines, and ameliorate their condition by methods of conciliation, arbitration or strikes." But that language being equivocal, the intended monopoly could only be gathered, if at all, from a reading and due consideration of the Constitution, in its entirety, interpreted in the light of the Union's acts.

Section 2 of Article 1 of the present Constitution is the same as it was in 1902, but the question whether the United Mine Workers seek to be and are a monopoly is no longer debatable. The following constitutional provisions are before this Court:

> "One of the objects of this organization is to unite all employes in and around the coal mines of Ohio and the Panhandle District of West Virginia." Sec. 2, Art. 1, Const. Dist. No. 6, U. M. W. of A.
>
> "The object of this organization is to unite the mine employes of Belmont, Jefferson, Tuscarawas, Harrison, and Carroll counties in Ohio, and that part of Stark County, south of Canton, other than the Massillon Seam, and Hancock, Brooke, Ohio, and Marshall counties of West Virginia, to ameliorate their conditions by methods of conciliation, arbitration or strike." Sec. 2, Art. 1, Const. Sub-Dist. 5 of Dist. 6, U. M. W. of A.
>
> "All men are eligible and must be members of the U. M. W. of A. who work in and around the mines." Sec. 3, Art. I, Const. Sub-Dist. 5 of Dist. 6, U. M. W. of A.

Transposed, this last constitutional provision thus says:

> "All men who work in and around the mines are eligible and must be members of the U. M. W. of A."

The Commission, while not saying whether the Union was a lawful or an unlawful organization, did say, however, on page 490:

> "The Union must not undertake to assume, or to interfere with, the management of the business of the employer."

Yet read these constitutional provisions:

> "When it becomes necessary for a District President to close a mine, or when a mine or mines from some other legitimate cause has been forced to close down, said officers may, if they deem it wise, close every other mine in district, or may distribute those idle men into any other mine or mines in the district in which said mine or mines so closed may be situated." Sec. 2, Art. VIII, Const. Dist. 6, U. M. W. of A.
> "Any member of our organization working in or around the mine, working on idle days, or extra time, in violation of our Constitution, or agreements, shall be fined $2.50 for each offense." Sec. 15, Art. IX, Const. Dist. No. 6, U. M. W. of A., Sec. 3, Art. IX, Const. Sub-Dist. 5 of Dist. 6, U. M. W. of A.

Strong light is thrown on these provisions and on the general design of the Union by the declaration as to the objects of the United Mine Workers of America contained in the excerpt from the proceedings of their Eighteenth Annual Convention held at Indianapolis, Indiana, January 15 to 22, 1907, which appears in the bill, and reads as follows:

> "Organized labor contends that as industry cannot exist without labor, labor has the right to say under what conditions it shall be employed, thereby dictating the management of the productive end of the business."

In connection with the thus openly acknowledged intention of the United Mine Workers of America as a national organization to dictate the management of the productive end of the coal business in this entire country, the provisions of the constitutions above quoted are living elements of, and confirm that Union's existence as, a monopoly at common law.

If the record thus made does not show an intention on the part of the national organization to control all coal mining in this country and to put into effect a "closed shop" in that industry, we are unable to comprehend the force of the English language.

At the foundation of the right of labor unions to exist there is the old common law which allowed the formation of guilds. But even guilds were regulated by statute in the early history of England. This was because they abused their power. And it came to pass that "combinations of laborers not connected with guilds were early made illegal, and the duty to labor and the settlement of the price of labor were made matters of public concern." 14 Ency. Laws of England, 2d Ed., London and Edinburgh, March, 1909, page 191, "Trades Unions." Hence, while it is correct to say that labor unions have the right to exist under the common law in West Virginia, they may exist for lawful purposes only, and they must not design, neither may they do, anything unlawful. In other words, no labor union in West Virginia has any privilege over any other body of men or over any person, natural or corporate. It is not every labor union that violates the law, either in its purposes or in its practices. And the contention in the case now at the bar of this Court is not one whereby the right of labor unions to exist is questioned or will be determined. The question is, Are not the United Mine Workers of America an unlawful organization? Their sphere of action is national. They aim to be and are a monopoly. And this monopoly they exercise in connection with the mining of coal, and coal is a necessity. It is true that coal is not, per se, a necessity in the same sense that air is, but to people living in the United States, situated as the United States are, in the North Temperate Zone, coal is a necessity. As much so as grain is. And it is not material whether coal is or is not a necessity in the Torrid Zone. Hence, the United Mine Workers of America have given a public interest to their occupation and to their organization. So true is this that for years the United Mine Workers of America as an organization and their aims and practices have been matters of grave public concern. As witness the anthracite strike of 1902, the appointment of a national commission by President Roosevelt and its report. The periodical adjustment of the national scale and the public's consequent unrest at each recurring period are matters of common knowledge and of common dread. And so long as this organization exists, as it now exists, and so long as its field of endeavor is national and exclusive of all other organizations for the mining of coal, and so long as the exercise of its unlawful power remains uncurtailed and unrebuked, just so long will the welfare of this country, the industry of its people and their comfort in life be and remain under a standing menace.

The case of Lohse Patent Door Co. v. Fuelle et al. (Supreme Court of Missouri, Nov. 25, 1908, rehearing denied Dec. 23, 1908), 114 S. W. Rep. 997, is an interesting case on a number of points, not the least of which is the one holding that at common law personal service—an occupation—could not be the subject of a monopoly. Baldly put, that statement would seem to hold that labor unions by combining and becoming national, or if not a combination of many into one, then one organization, national in character, would be lawful.

Judge Woodson says, 114 S. W. 1002, 1003: "According to the allegations of the petition and admissions of the demurrer, the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of the city of St. Louis, and the various other associations with which it affiliates, are composed of carpenters, joiners and other persons who do carpenter work and other labor in the construction of houses and other buildings in the city of St. Louis and throughout the country. It is alleged and admitted that the object and purpose of these associations is to shorten the hours of work and to increase the pay they are to receive for their labor. While it might be conceded that labor organizations might be proper subjects for legislative control and regulation, yet the legislature has not in its wisdom seen proper to do so; and at common law personal service—an occupation—could not be the subject of a monopoly. In discussing that question in the case of State ex rel. v. Associated Press, 159 Mo. loc. cit. 456, 60 S. W. 91, 104, 51 L. R. A. 151, 81 Am. St. Rep. 368, this court used this language: 'But there is nothing here on which a monopoly can attach. The business is one of mere personal service—an occupation. Unless there is "property" to be "affected with a public interest," there is no basis laid for the fact or the charge of a monopoly.' The authorities seem to be uniform in holding that individuals have a perfect legal right to form labor organizations for the protection and promotion of the interests of the laboring classes and deny the power to enjoin the members of such organizations from peaceably withdrawing from the service of the employer. Wabash R. Co. v. Hannahan (C. C.), 121 Fed. 563; National Protective Asso. v. Cummings, 170 N. Y. 315, 63 N. E. 369, 58 L. R. A. 135, 88 Am. C.), 62 Fed. 7; Atchison, T. & St. F. Ry. Co. v. Gee (C. C.), 140 Fed. 153; Arthur v. Oakes, 63 Fed. 310, 11 C. C. A. 209, 25 L. R. A. 414. Many more adjudications of the same nature exist and might be cited, but as there is no conflict between the modern decisions upon this question, it would be a useless waste of time and labor to cite more. These decisions are based upon the law which permits every one to enter into any kind of a contract which has for its object and purpose the protection and promotion of the interest of the parties thereto, as well as the betterment of their condition in life, and that right to so contract is not curtailed or abridged if, perchance, the contract indirectly or incidentally operates in restraint of trade. We must therefore hold that the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners and their allied associations whom the defendants represent, are not unlawful combinations made and entered into in restraint of trade, but are legal and highly laudable when confined within proper bounds."

Professor Stimson, in his recent work on Federal and State Constitutions of the United States, 1908, says on page 30: "Coming last to the liberty of labor or trade, it is the more important to trace the appearance of the great principles falling under this head, for the reason that they have been largely lost sight of in American jurisprudence. The frequent enactment of acts against trusts, monopolies or contracts in restraint of trade, both state and federal, show that our legislatures, if not our Bench and Bar, must have substantially forgotten the body of the common law, to say nothing of the course of English constitutional history upon these matters.

"For the broader understanding of the liberty right involves as well as the liberty of life and person, the liberty to support life and family. That is, to exercise one's labor freely and without control, to acquire possessions, to earn wages and to exercise one's faculties in any lawful way, without competition by the State or any organism of the State and without restraint or hindrance by the Government or by individuals. The extent of this right is the matter most discussed today, and therefore it is far the most important one to be considered. Closely connected with it is the right to private property, at least in so far as such property is the result of a man's labor, and the right to freedom of contract for such labor or in the exercise of such trade both as to reward or profits and conditions. There is probably no constitutional principle more often invaded by modern statutes than is this."

And on page 18 he says: "The right of liberty in trade or industry involves the notion of protection from any monopoly or any privilege even if granted by the State, as well as from any combination of guilds or other workmen."

Reverting to the case of Lohse Patent Door Co. v. Fuelle et al., 114 S. W. 997, we ask attention to two points. One of them is, that to be lawful at common law a labor union must be "confined within proper bounds." This principle applied prevents the lawful existence of a national organization which has for its purpose the suppressing of all competition in any given trade. That doctrine is the same that was applied in the case of Berry v. Donovan, 188 Mass. 353, and it is the same doctrine that was applied in the case of Jacobs, as President of the Protective Coat Tailors' and Presser's Union, v. Cohen et al., 183 N. Y. 207. The other point to which we call attention is Judge Woodson's reference to the doctrine of the Supreme Court of the United States announced in the case of Munn et al. v. The People of the State of Illinois (1876), 4 Otto 113 (94 U. S.), 24 L. Ed. 77. Judge Woodson held in Lohse Patent Door Co. v. Fuelle et al., that Munn's case did not apply to the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners and its allied similar associations, composed of carpenters, joiners, and other persons, who do carpenter work and other labor in the construction of houses and other buildings in the city of St. Louis and throughout the country. A house is a convenience, but coal is a necessity. And a moment's consideration of the facts of this case now at the bar of this Court will show that the doctrine in the Munn case does apply to the United Mine Workers of America, the defendants in this case.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite, in rendering the opinion of the Court in the Munn case, held that a public interest may attach where property is put to a public use, and that the employer is then held to regulation by law. And the same opinion recognized that an employment may be of such a character as to be likewise invested with a public interest. For example, suppose a combination of all the growers of grain in this country. Will any one question that such a combination would be unlawful if, as a result, no one was allowed to raise grain unless he belonged to that union? And yet the United Mine Workers of America aim to let no one work in the mining of coal unless he belongs to their Union, and to let no operator mine coal unless under their jurisdiction and control.

Applying this to the case at bar the Court will take judicial notice of the fact that coal is a necessity; that it exists in different localities throughout the United States, and that from climatic conditions it is essential that coal be mined and be furnished, not only with regularity, but at reasonable prices, and be obtainable, freely and at all times, in the common markets throughout our entire land. The Court will also take judicial notice of the frequent national strikes which have been called and enforced by this national organization. It will take judicial notice of the widespread discomfort and distress which these strikes have brought about and which they must of necessity continue to bring about so long as that power of that Union is permitted to exist and to be exercised in that way. It will be admitted that it would not be obnoxious to the rule in the Munn case for men engaged in mining coal to unite and form a labor union in any given locality for proper purposes and to conduct their union in a proper way. But a combination of all such unions into a national one to aim and do as the United Mine Workers of America aim and do would be obnoxious to the doctrine in the Munn case.

If all the coal operators in this country were to combine and say that no one could mine coal unless he worked for their combination, and that no one could buy coal unless he paid their price, how long would such a thing be tolerated? Yet the United Mine Workers of America have not only openly organized themselves into a monopoly to control the entire coal mining industry of this country, but they have undertaken to establish the "closed shop" and to deny a man the right to work at that occupation unless he is a member of their Union, and to deny the right of an employer to operate a coal mine unless he runs it Union, and they have gone further and said to the coal consuming public that the mining of coal shall be suspended throughout the entire land until they have their way.

And it is their claim that not only have they the right to form such an organization, not only have they the right when and as they will to declare national strikes, which bring about national suffering, but that that right to exist and that right to bring about that suffering and to paralyze the industries of this country are rights guaranteed to them as citizens of the United States. Why? How?

What Rights Have the Defendants in the Conduct of Their Business?

We will sub-divide this into two heads:

1. If the United Mine Workers are an unlawful body.
2. If the United Mine Workers are a lawful body.

1. If the United Mine Workers are an Unlawful Body?

If the United Mine Workers are an unlawful organization in professed design or in fact, then no act done in carrying out an unlawful design or in doing an unlawful act can be held to be lawful.

2. If the United Mine Workers are a Lawful Body.

We will sub-divide this into two heads:

2 x. Defendants' permissive rights.

2 y. Plaintiff's affirmative rights which explain, limit, or modify defendants' rights.

2x. Defendants' Permissive Rights.

We premise discussion of this point by calling attention to the fact that the defendants are officers of a Labor Union, and that they claim the right to organize plaintiff's non-union mine. Unlike organizations which exist for religious and social advancement, many Labor Unions, and amongst them the United Mine Workers of America, while professing laudable purposes, have in fact purposes which are unlawful. In carrying out the various purposes of the Union some of which are lawful and others of which are unlawful, the defendants, as officers of the Union, do acts, some of which are entirely proper and others of which are entirely wrong. Imbued with the idea that certain of their acts are right, they affect to believe all of their acts are right. They forget or ignore the fact that a lawful act under one set of circumstances may become an unlawful act under a different set of circumstances. In such case, the motive is the controlling factor and determines the lawfulness or the unlawfulness of the act done.

The propagation of the doctrines of religious and social bodies is in the main along the line of public meetings, to which the individual may resort on his own initiative and of his own free will. In some instances, personal appeal by personal visitation is made. Labor Unions, while, under ordinary circumstances, entitled to use both methods, resort chiefly to organizers. The United Mine Workers of America depend upon organizers. Hughes is one of their organizers, and it was over his efforts, as such organizer, to unionize plaintiff's non-union mine, that the controversy in this case arose.

It is unusual to find Labor Unions insisting, in Court, upon their right to organize non-union men in breach of contracts the non-union men have with their employer. Yet such a case is presented here. Generally, organization is effected in a different way. A boycott of the employer's output is instituted, and, by that means, the non-union employer is brought to his knees through failure of the consumer to handle his product. But to boycott a certain manufacturer of hats is one thing, and to boycott the product of a certain coal mine is another thing. In the case of the boycotted hat, success is comparatively easy. In the case of the boycotted coal mine, success is well-nigh impossible. The reason is obvious. Men are markets for hats; railroads and manufactories are markets for coal. So, inasmuch as boycotting, in the customary phase of its application, is not available to defendants as a ready means of unionizing plaintiff's non-union mine, they make the claim that they should be given the right to send organizers amongst plaintiff's men and induce a breach of the contracts the men have with plaintiff, and compel plaintiff to breach its contracts with such of its employees as the defendants and their organizers may, after effort, have been unable to induce to join the Union. We claim that such a course is wrong for two reasons. It involves an intentional breach of contracts existing between third persons, with whom defendants have no business or contractual relations whatever. And it really means to boycott the plaintiff, although in another form, by getting all men to refuse to work for plaintiff.

Therefore, in discussing the permissive rights of these defendants, engaged in running the United Mine Workers of America, in their efforts to increase the membership of the Union, and, particularly, in their efforts, in this case, to increase the membership of the Union through organizers, who undertake to bring about breaches of contracts existing between the employes and plaintiff, on the one side, and between the plaintiff and its employes on the other side, the permissive rights will not be interpreted to include the application of such rights to legitimating induced or enforced breaches of contract. Neither will the permissive rights herein spoken of be held to include the application of such rights in aid of the accomplishment of any unlawful purpose. Subject to the foregoing, now let us see what are the permissive rights of these defendants.

In the case of In re Higgins (C. C., N. D. Texas, 1886), 27 Fed. 443, 445, Judge Pardee said: "Labor organizations are lawful and generally laudable associations, but they have no legal status or authority, and stand before men and the law on no better footing than other social organizations."

The Texas & Pacific Railway Company was in the hands of receivers appointed by Judge Pardee. The receivers had agents. These agents had discharged as incompetent, and for absence without leave, a certain employe, and refused to reinstate him at the demand of a secret labor organization which claimed that this discharge was in violation of an agreement forced upon the managers of the road prior to the receivership. There was no complaint made to the receivers, or to the Court, by any employe, of bad treatment or insufficient wages or other grievances; and yet orders were issued from the secret organization to all their employes to quit work, to strike, to cripple the operations of the road; and many of the employes did quit, and induced and forced others to quit, and hindered and delayed the operation of the railway, and damaged the property in possession of the Court many thousands of dollars. Judge Pardee said of the reason assigned for the strike, that, if true, the reason was impertinent and that such demands could not be tolerated. He said further that the alleged reason was a mere scheme and pretense, and that the real motive for the order to strike was to compel a recognition of a certain secret labor organization (which, by evidence, had been shown to be about as arbitrary and autocratic in dealing with labor as the famous Six Companies of China) as an existing power, so that its officers should be consulted in the operation and management of railroads in which they do not own any interest, and of which they do not even pretend to be employes.

Along the same line of thought, Judge Brown in Old Dominion Steam-Ship Co. v. McKenna (C. C., S. D. New York, 1887), 30 Fed. 48, 50, said: "Associations have no more right to inflict injury upon others than individuals have. All combinations and associations designed to coerce workmen to become members, or to interfere with, obstruct, vex, or annoy them in working, or in obtaining work, because they are not members, or in order to induce them to become members; or designed to prevent employers from making a just discrimination in the rate of wages paid to the skillful and to the unskillful; to the diligent and to the lazy; to the efficient and to the inefficient; and all associations designed to interfere with the perfect freedom of employers in the proper management and control of their lawful business, or to dictate in any particular the terms upon which their business shall be conducted, by means of threats of injury or loss, by interference with their property or traffic, or with their lawful employment of other persons, or designed to abridge any of these rights—are pro tanto illegal combinations or associations; and all acts done in furtherance of such intentions by such means, and accompanied by damage, are actionable." He cited many authorities.

In the case of Thomas v. Cincinnati, New Orleans & Texas Pacific Railway Company, In re Phelan (C. C., S. D. Ohio, W. D. 1894), 62 Fed. 803, 817, Judge Taft said: "Now, it may be conceded in the outset that the employes of the receiver had the right to organize into or to join a labor union which should take joint action as to their terms of employment. It is of benefit to them and to the public that laborers should unite in their common interest and for lawful purposes. They have labor to sell. If they stand together, they are often able, all of them, to command better prices for their labor than when dealing singly with rich employers, because the necessities of the single employe may compel him to accept any terms offered him. The accumulation of a fund for the support of those who feel that the wages offered are below market prices is one of the legitimate objects of such an organization. They have the right to appoint officers who shall advise them as to the course to be taken by them in their relations with their employer. They may unite with other unions. The officers they appoint, or any other person to whom they choose to listen, may advise them as to the proper course to be taken by them in regard to their employment, or, if they choose to repose such authority in any one, may order them on pain of expulsion from their union, peaceably to leave the employ of their employer because any of the terms of their employment are unsatisfactory."

In that case, Phelan was before the Court for contempt as a result of a conspiracy between himself and Debs and others to tie up the Cincinnati, New Orleans & Texas Pacific Railway which was in the hands of a receiver appointed by Judge Taft. The conspiracy consisted of an effort of the American Railway Union to compel the Pullman Company to comply with certain demands of the Pullman Company's employes, and in aid thereof to compel the receiver to abandon the hauling of Pullman cars, the Union going so far as to urge all of the members of the American Railway Union throughout the United States to make similar demands of the different railways throughout the country, or else leave the service of their employer. Phelan urged the employes to quit the service of the receiver and the other railroads of Cincinnati, and to tie them all up, and to prevent other persons from taking their places, by persuasion if possible, by clubbing if necessary.

The Pullman Company's employes were not members of the American Railway Union, and when the Pullman Company closed its works, rather than grant an increase of wages which the employes had demanded, the American Railway Union, which met in general convention shortly thereafter, took up the cudgel on behalf of the employes of the Pullman Company. The motive actuating the American Railway Union may have been sympathy, or it may have been to exhibit and magnify the power of the American Railway Union itself. Suffice it to say, the controversy was not between the employes and the receiver of the Cincinnati, New Orleans & Texas Pacific Railway, except so far as these employes, after being incited to do so, adopted the quarrel of the Pullman Railway Company's employes as their own.

In restraining Phelan and others from inducing the receiver's employes to quit work and tie up the Cincinnati, New Orleans & Texas Pacific Railway until the receiver would agree not to carry Pullman cars in their trains, Judge Taft held that the action of the American Railway Union was wrong for two reasons; first, the American Railway Union was interfering with the contractual relations existing between the receiver and the Pullman Company for the hauling of Pullman cars, to which contractual relations the American Railway Union was a stranger. Hence, the Railway Union was an intermeddler. And second, by its course of action, the American Railway Union was engaged in a boycott. It was seeking to drive the Pullman Company out of business, unless that Company would accede to the demands of its employes. The American Railway Union had no contractual or other relations with the Pullman Company. The employes of the Pullman Company and the Pullman Company made their own contracts governing their own mutual relations. And to such contracts, the Railway Union was likewise a stranger.

Judge Taft further held: "A malicious or unlawful interference with the business of another by inducing his employes to leave his service is an actionable wrong and subjects the offender to liability for the loss sustained." 62 Fed. 816.

In the case of Wabash Railroad Company v. Hannahan and others (C. C., E. D. Missouri, E. D. 1903), 121 Fed. 563, 568, 569, Judge Adams said:

> "An employee has an unquestionable right to place a price and impose conditions upon his labor at the outset of his employment, or, unless restrained by contract obligations, upon the continuance of his labor at any time thereafter; and, if the terms and conditions are not complied with by the employer he has a clear right either not to engage or having engaged in his service to cease from work. What one may do all may do.
> "They may seek and obtain counsel and advice concerning their rights, duties, and obligations in relation to their employer, and persons interested in their welfare may advise, aid, and assist them in securing such terms and conditions of service as will best subserve their interests, and what they may lawfully do singly or together they may organize and combine to accomplish.
> "In like manner, as capital is combined for legitimate purposes, so labor may combine for legitimate purposes, but this right of combination, and the resulting right to strike or quit their employment, is a weapon for the defense and protection of employes, and not a weapon of attack. They may, by peaceful and lawful combination and concert of action, be able to so control the supply of labor as to compel the employer to come to their terms, but they are not at liberty to make use of this weapon to otherwise interfere with or injure the employer or co-employe. The clear line of demarkation, recognized by all the authorities, is that the lawful and permissible strike must not be attended by violence to or destruction of property or by other coercive measures intended to prevent the employer from securing other employes or otherwise carrying on his business according to his own judgment."

In that case, the Wabash Railroad Company sought to enjoin Hannahan, grand master of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen, W. G. Lee, vice grand master of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, and officers and members of the joint protective board of the first-mentioned and of the general grievance committee of the second-named order. The plaintiff claimed that the defendants were trying to unionize the Wabash road. The defendants denied this, and said that as officers they were acting at the request and by the authority of a large majority of plaintiff's employes, who were members of the two Brotherhoods, and they further said they were in good faith making an effort to better the condition of the men's service and to secure a higher rate of wages therefor; and that any strike which they were about to sanction was intended only for the purpose of peaceably asserting the rights which they demanded. Upon the bill, answers and affidavits, Judge Adams found that plaintiff had not proved that the defendants were engaged in trying to unionize the Wabash road, and further found that the defendants were representing employes of the Wabash road and that these employes were members of the orders, which were represented by the defendants, and further found that at the time there was a very general demand for an increase of wages and change in rules and conditions of service by employes of the Wabash road, and that this demand had been brought to the attention of the railroad company. Under those circumstances, Judge Adams refused to enjoin the defendants from ordering a strike of the members of their Brotherhoods who were then working for the Wabash road.

In his opinion, above quoted, Judge Adams gives expression to—"What one may do all may do," and "what they may lawfully do singly or together they may organize and combine to accomplish." This doctrine is taken from the case of Arthur v. Oakes (C. C. A., Seventh Circuit), 11 C. C. A. 209, 63 Fed. 310. And while the use Judge Adams makes of that doctrine in the sentences quoted was entirely proper in view of the facts of the case he was deciding and to the extent of his decision, that doctrine as expressed in that and similar language has unfortunately been taken by Labor Unions to mean a carte blanche.

In the case of United States v. Debs et al., Union Trust Company v. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railroad Company (C. C., N. D. Illinois, 1894), 64 Fed. 724, 763, Judge Woods said:

> "In the recent case of Arthur v. Oakes (C. C. A., 7th Circuit), 63 Fed. 310, it was decided, with my full concurrence in the opinion, that a court of equity will not, 'under any circumstances, by injunction, prevent one individual from quitting the personal service of another'; and in respect to the right of employes, singly or in concert, to quit work, and of others to advise them on the subject, there is no present necessity for adding to what was said in that case, further than to observe that neither expressly nor by implication does the opinion there delivered lend the remotest sanction to the proposition asserted by one of the counsel for the defendants, that in free America every man has a right to abandon his position, for a good or a bad reason, and that another, for good or bad reason, may advise or persuade him to do so. Manifestly that is not true. If it were, a servant might quit his place, and another might advise him to quit, in order to make way for the entry of thieves or burglars into the employer's house—a suggestion at which simple minds revolt, and for which the acutest can invent neither justification nor apology. The rule is familiar in criminal jurisprudence that any act, however innocent in itself, becomes wrongful or criminal when done in furtherance of an unlawful design. But whether or not, in a particular case, an injunction will be appropriate, and to what extent it shall go if granted, will depend on other considerations than the mere wrongfulness or illegality of the act or conduct proposed to be enjoined. The right of men to strike peaceably, and the right to advise a peaceable strike, which the law does not presume to be impossible, is not questioned. But if men enter into a conspiracy to do an unlawful thing, and, in order to accomplish their purpose, advise workmen to go upon a strike, knowing that violence and wrong will be the probable outcome, neither in law nor in morals can they escape responsibility."

In the case of Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Company v. Switchmen's Union of North America and others (C. C., W. D. New York, 1907), 158 Fed. 541, 543, the rights of workmen are defined by Judge Hazel in the following language:

"That workmen may strike or quit their employment ad libitum is well recognized by all the authorities, and that they may do so singly or in concert, even though it be in violation of their service contract, has also been held. In Hopkins v. Oxley Stave Co., 83 Fed. 912, 28 C. C. A. 99, the principle is thus stated: 'The courts have invariably upheld the right of individuals to form labor organizations for the protection of the interests of the laboring classes, and have denied the power to enjoin the members of such associations from withdrawing peaceably from any service, either singly or in a body, even where such withdrawal involves a breach of contract.' And in Arthur v. Oakes, 63 Fed. 310, 11 C. C. A. 209, 25 L. R. A. 414, an earlier case, Mr. Justice Harlan, sitting in the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit, and writing the opinion of the Court, says: 'Those employes having taken service, first with the company, and afterwards with the receivers, under a general contract of employment, which did not limit the exercise of the right to quit the service, their peaceable co-operation as the result of friendly argument, persuasion, or conference among themselves, in asserting the right of each and all to refuse further service under a schedule of reduced wages, would not have been illegal and criminal, although they may have so acted in the firm belief and expectation that a simultaneous quitting without notice would temporarily inconvenience the receivers and the public.' The Court broadly held that the employes in good faith and peaceably had the right to leave the service of their employer, but without injuring or interfering with the free action of others. It follows, therefore, whenever a conspiracy is alleged that it must be shown that the intention of the conspirators was to inflict wrong upon the complainant, and if the defendants herein acting together tried to have the employes break their contract, or urged them to leave the employ of the complainant, the court has power to interfere."

In the case of United States ex rel. Guaranty Trust Company of New York v. Haggerty et al. (C. C., N. D. West Virginia, 1902), 116 Fed. 510, 515, 516, 517, Judge Jackson said:

"I do not question the right of the employes of this company to quit work at any time they desire to do so, unless there is a contractual relation between them and the employer which should control their right to quit. At the same time I do not recognize the right of an employer to coerce the employes to continue their work when they desire to quit."

And again he said:

"While I recognize the right for all laborers to combine for the purpose of protecting all their lawful rights, I do not recognize the right of laborers to conspire together to compel employes who are not dissatisfied with their work in the mines to lay down their picks and shovels and to quit their work, without a just or proper reason therefor, merely to gratify a professional set of 'agitators, organizers, and walking delegates,' who roam all over the country as agents for some combination, who are vampires that live and fatten on the honest labor of the coal miners of the country, and who are busybodies creating dissatisfaction amongst a class of people who are quiet, well-disposed, and who do not want to be disturbed by the unceasing agitation of this class of people."

And again he said:

"Their mission here is to foment trouble, create dissatisfaction among the employes in coal mines, producing strikes, which tends greatly to damage and injure the business of the employers."

And again he said:

"The right of a citizen to labor for wages that he is satisfied with is a right protected by law, and is entitled to the same protection as free speech, and should be better protected than the abuse of free speech, in which the organizers and agitators indulge in trying to produce strikes."

In that case the defendants, Haggerty and others, all non-residents of West Virginia, came into the State as organizers for the United Mine Workers of America, and undertook to organize the mines of the Clarksburg Fuel Company. Their method was to induce employes who were not dissatisfied with the terms of their employment to strike, and the Court enjoined such methods on the ground that these organizers were actuated by a desire to inflict injury and damage upon the employers.

In the case of United States v. Weber et al. (C. C., W. D. Virginia, 1902), 114 Fed. 950, 953, Judge McDowell said:

"The right of the employes of the receivers to voluntarily join a union that has only legal purposes > in view cannot be denied. Moreover, the right to induce, by legal methods and fair moral suasion, the employes of the receivers to join such an organization is not denied. But if the object of the union is illegal, or if the methods employed by it, either to induce acquisitions to its ranks or to accomplish its ulterior purposes, are illegal, it appears to be well settled that the persons who combine in such efforts are conspirators."

In that case, Judge McDowell, in treating of the legality of the motive actuating the United Mine Workers of America, who were at the time trying to organize certain mines in Virginia, which were in the hands of receivers appointed by the Federal Court, said:

> "In the first place, it is hardly open to serious question that the ultimate purpose of the union is not legal. This purpose is to secure control of mining operations, including those under the management of the receivers of this Court. Confessedly, control is desired for this purpose: If the union miners in some other State make complaint of grievance — the justness of the complaint to be judged solely by the union—the union will be in a position to enforce compliance with their demands by ordering and carrying into effect a general strike.
> "Can this Court rightfully surrender control of the works under its charge to the United Mine Workers? On authority it is clear that it cannot. See In re Higgins (C. C.) 27 Fed. 445; In re Wabash R. Co. (C. C.) 24 Fed. 217; In re Doolittle (C. C.) 23 Fed. 544; Thomas v. Railroad Co. (C. C.) 62 Fed. 803. On reason, also, it is equally clear."

In the case of In re Wabash Railroad Company (C. C., W. D. Missouri, 1885), 24 Fed. 217, 220, Judge Krekel said:

> "Courts do not interfere between employer and employes, except to declare what the rights of the parties are, and to keep order. Men may work or cease working as they choose, provided they violate no contract. They may combine and peaceably seek to forward their interest in any manner, provided they do no violence to others' rights, or commit no violation of law."

In the case of Curran v. Galen, President of Brewery Workingmen's Local Assembly et al. (1897), 152 N. Y. 33, 37 L. R. A. 802, 46 N. E. 297, the Court said (37 L. R. A. 804) Per Curiam—

> "It is proper and praiseworthy, and perhaps falls within that general view of human society which perceives an underlying law that men should unite to achieve that which each by himself cannot achieve, or can achieve less readily. But the social principle which justifies such organizations is departed from when they are so extended in their operations as either to intend or to accomplish injury to others. Public policy and the interests of society favor the utmost freedom in the citizen to pursue his lawful trade or calling, and if the purpose of an organization or combination of workingmen be to hamper or to restrict that freedom, and, through contracts or arrangements with employers, to coerce other workingmen to become members of the organization and to come under its rules and conditions, under the penalty of the loss of their positions and of deprivation of employment, then that purpose seems clearly unlawful, and militates against the spirit of our government and the nature of our institutions. The effectuation of such a purpose would conflict with that principle of public policy which prohibits monopolies and exclusive privileges."

In that case, Curran, who was an engineer by trade, was employed from day to day by the Miller Brewing Company and was earning a good income, and had constant employment. There was a voluntary association in the City of Rochester, where he lived, called the Brewery Workingmen's Local Assembly, 1,796. It was composed of workingmen employed in the brewery business in Rochester, and was a branch of a national organization known as the Knights of Labor. Curran was solicited to join the union, but declined. He was then threatened that unless he joined and paid his initiation fee and subjected himself to the rules and regulations of the Union, the union would obtain Curran's discharge from the employment he then had, and would make it impossible for him to obtain employment in Rochester or elsewhere. He still refused; then he was discharged. The Miller Brewing Company belonged to the Ale Brewers' Association of Rochester, and that association had an agreement with the union that no employe should work for a longer period than four weeks without becoming a member of the union. The defense put up was, that Curran was retained in the employ of the Miller Brewing Company for more than four weeks after he was notified of the provisions of the agreement, which required him to become a member of the union, and that upon his continued refusal to join the union, the defendants had simply notified the Miller Brewing Company of its contract, and thereupon Curran had been discharged.

In the opinion of the Court, this language appears—

> "The candid mind should shrink from the results of the operation of the principle contended for here; for there would certainly be a compulsion or a fettering of the individual glaringly at variance with that freedom in the pursuit of happiness which is believed to be guaranteed to all by the provisions of the fundamental law of the State. The sympathies or the fellow feeling which, as a social principle, underlies the association of workingmen for their common benefit, are not consistent with a purpose to oppress the individual who prefers by single effort to gain his livelihood. If organization of workingmen is in line with good government, it is because it is intended as a legitimate instrumentality to promote the common good of its members. If it militates against the general public interest, if its powers are directed towards the repression of individual freedom, upon what principle shall it be justified?"

In the case of Iron Molders' Union No. 125, of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, et al. v. Allis-Chalmers Company (C. C. A. Seventh Circuit, 1908), 166 Fed. 45, the correlative rights and the correlative obligations of employer and employes when engaged in a strike or lockout are in the language of Judge Grosscup clearly and compactly set forth. That case was a strike case. The Allis-Chalmers Company employed foundrymen and other persons who were members of the Iron Molders' Union No. 125, and of the other defendant unions. Certain demands, including increased wages, were made by the employes through these unions, acting through a conference committee. The Allis-Chalmers Company increased the wages to an amount exceeding the sums demanded, but refused the other demands. Thereupon the employes struck. The bill states that the object of the strike was to control the employment of the molders' apprentices, handy men, superintendents, and assistant superintendents, and to prevent any such mechanics from working at their trade without first becoming members of the union. The bill averred that those apprentices were learning the molder's trade and that some of them had a long time and others had a short time to work. Section 16 of the decree (166 Fed. 48) relates solely to apprentices, and by the bill these apprentices had unfulfilled time contracts. But the language of the Appellate Court (166 Fed. 49, 50) in including "others" with apprentices would seem to indicate that that Court intended to extend to the Allis-Chalmers Company the protection of the Court's prohibition against persuasion to all persons employed by it to serve for a definite time, whether in fact such persons were, or were not, apprentices. The Allis-Chalmers Company then undertook to get other persons to take the place of the strikers, and the defendants alleged that in so doing the Allis-Chalmers Company was endeavoring to coerce the defendants to return to work, and that it had given out that it would not employ any of the defendants so long as they were members of the union. In this contest, the defendants resorted to persuasion to induce the new men to quit work and to induce men not to go to work. They also resorted to persuasion to induce persons under contract for a specific length of time to quit work, and they resorted to picketing. Having been enjoined by the lower court from doing these amongst other things (150 Fed. 155, 161) an appeal was taken.

The Circuit Court of Appeals held that there was in that case a genuine struggle of labor by the employes of the Allis-Chalmers Company to obtain better terms and conditions from their employer,and that in such a struggle the rights of the contending sides were not only equal but mutual. The Court accordingly held that inasmuch as the Company was allowed to persuade men to take the places of their striking employes, therefore the striking employes had the right to persuade these men to quit working or to persuade others not to take the places of the strikers. This was on the ground of equality of rights. But the Court held that the strikers were not entitled to use persuasion to induce the Company's apprentices and others to break their contract to serve for definite times. And with reference to the last mentioned holding, the Court said:

> "And the reason, we believe, is quite plain. Each party to such a contract has a property interest in it. If either breaks it, he does a wrong, for which the other is entitled to a remedy. And whoever knowingly makes himself a party to a wrongful and injurious act becomes equally liable."

So that the Court adhered to the general doctrine that even in the case of a strike the strikers are not justified in bringing about a breach of contracts existing between their employer and third persons.

And owing to the fact that that suit was brought to protect the property rights of the Allis-Chalmers Company and that these property rights were alleged to be simply employments at will without other stipulation or agreement, save in the case of the apprentices who had unfulfilled terms of service, and save also as to any other employes with whom the Company had contracts to serve for definite times, the Court drew a distinction between the Company's rights with regard to its men who were employed at will and the Company's rights with regard to its men who were employed to serve for definite times, and held that contracts of service at will were not property rights superior to the rights of employes of the Company on strike for legitimate purposes, who had also been employes at will, where there still existed between the striking employe and his employer the peculiar relationship created by the existence of a strike or lockout, a strike or lockout, as to the employes who have not finally and in good faith abandoned their employment, being held by the Court not to completely terminate the relationship between the parties. It will be noticed that the Appellate Court does not say that the only kind of a contract which will be protected is one for a definite length of time. The holding is, that a contract for a definite length of time will be protected. It will be borne in mind that an employer and an employe may contract with each other on any terms, in any way, and on any subject-matter they please, so long as not contrary to law. And inasmuch as the making of the contract would create a property right in which each party has an interest, strikers would be precluded from bringing about a breach of such contracts. A fortiori would such contracts be protected against intermeddlers. It will not be forgotten that the Appellate Court, in that case, was dealing with a genuine labor struggle for lawful purposes, and that it was defining the rights of quasi employes. The defendants in that case were not simply intermeddlers. So for the purpose of defining the rights of strikers in such a case in the use of persuasion, the Appellate Court held that the incorporeal value of a going business, based upon the right to the continuing services of those who accepted employment at will until such services were terminated by the free act of one or the other party to the employment, does not constitute property for the purpose of injunctive relief. But it is nowhere suggested that as against an intermeddler an employer does not have a property right sufficient for injunctive relief, where he bases his right upon the incorporeal value of a going business and the further right to the continuing services of those who accept employment at will until such services are terminated by the free act of one or the other party to the employment. A fortiori where the value of the going business is further based on a successful struggle against a labor union, where the labor union interferes with the business of the employer by inducing its employes to join the union and break contracts, which forbid them joining, and where the Union is trying to resume its sway over the recalcitrant employer.

Judge Grosscup recognized that there was some liability of misconstruction of the Court's opinion, and while concurring, said:

> "The foregoing opinion so compactly and clearly sets forth the correlative rights and the correlative obligations of employer and employes when engaged in a strike or lockout, that it is with hesitation that I add this word; and I only add it that nothing that is contained in the opinion may be construed to relate to the correlative rights and the correlative obligations of employer and employes in any relationship other than their somewhat anomalous relationship pending a strike or lockout.

"A strike is cessation of work by employes in an effort to get for the employes more desirable terms. A lockout is a cessation of the furnishing of work to employes in an effort to get for the employer more desirable terms. Neither strike nor lockout completely terminates, when this is its purpose, the relationship between the parties. The employes who remain to take part in the strike or weather the lockout do so that they may be ready to go to work again on terms to which they shall agree—the employer remaining ready to take them back on terms to which he shall agree. Manifestly, then, pending a strike or lockout, and as to those who have not finally and in good faith abandoned it, a relationship exists between employer and employe that is neither that of the general relation of employer and employe, nor again that of employer looking among strangers for employes, or employes seeking from strangers employment. And it is with respect to this somewhat anomalous relationship that, as I understand it, this opinion speaks; a statement that it seems to me ought to be made to confine the opinion to the actual situation to which it is intended to relate—to differentiate what we say from what might arise in cases where, neither strike nor lockout pending, persuasion is resorted to to induce other employers not to employ given applicants for employment, or to persuade employes not to take employment with given employers, upon which questions we do not, as I understand it, express any opinion."

Judge Grosscup's warning that the opinion of the Court in Iron Molders' Union v. Allis-Chalmers Company, 166 Fed. 45, is not to be construed to relate to the correlative rights and the correlative obligations of employer and employes in any relationship other than their somewhat anomalous relationship pending a strike or lockout, has manifest reference to the work of an intermeddler. And in this connection we want to call attention to Judge Grosscup's language In re Charge to Grand Jury (D. C., N. D. Illinois, 1894), 62 Fed. 828, 831, 832, 833:

> "I recognize, however, the right of labor to organize. Each man in America is a freeman, and, so long as he does not interfere with the rights of others, has the right to do with that which is his what he pleases. In the highest sense, a man's arm is his own, and, aside from contract relations, no one but he can direct when it shall be raised to work, or shall be dropped to rest. The individual option to work or to quit is the imperishable right of a freeman. But the raising and dropping of the arm is the result of a will that resides in the brain, and, much as we may desire that such wills should remain entirely independent, there is no mandate of law which prevents their association with others, and response to a higher will. The individual may feel himself, alone, unequal to cope with the conditions that confront him, or unable to comprehend the myraid of considerations that ought to control his conduct. He is entitled to the highest wage that the strategy of work or cessation of work may bring, and the limitations upon his intelligence and opportunities may be such that he does not choose to stand upon his own perception of strategic or other conditions. His right to choose a leader, one who observes, thinks, and wills for him—a brain skilled to observe his interest—is no greater pretension than that which is recognized in every other department of industry. So far, and within reasonable limits, associations of this character are not only not unlawful, but are, in my judgment, beneficial, when they do not restrain individual liberty, and are under enlightened and conscientious leadership.
> "But they are subject to the same laws as other associations. The leaders to whom are given the vast power of judging and acting for the members are simply, in that respect, their trustees. Their conduct must be judged, like that of other trustees, by the extent of their lawful authority, and the good faith with which they have executed it. No man, in his individual right, can lawfully demand and insist upon conduct by others which will lead to an injury to a third person's lawful rights. The railroads carrying the mails and interstate commerce have a right to the service of each of their employes until each lawfully chooses to quit; and any concerted action upon the part of others to demand or insist, under any effective penalty or threat, upon their quitting, to the injury of the mail service or the prompt transportation of interstate commerce, is a conspiracy, unless such demand or insistence is in pursuance of a lawful authority conferred upon them by the employes themselves, and is made in good faith in the execution of such authority. The demand and insistence under effective penalty or threat, and injury to the transportation of the mails or interstate commerce being proven, the burden falls upon those making the demand or insistence to show lawful authority and good faith in its execution.

"Let me illustrate: Twelve carpenters are engaged in building a house. Aside from contract regulations, they each can quit at pleasure. A thirteenth and fourteenth man, strangers to them, by concerted threats of holding them up to public odium or private malice, induce them to quit, and leave the house unfinished. The latter in no sense represent the former or their wishes, but are simply interlopers for mischief, and are guilty of conspiracy against the employers of the carpenters. But if, upon a trial for such, it results that, instead of being strangers, they are the trustees, agents or leaders of the twelve, with full power to determine for them whether their wage is such that they ought to continue or quit, and that they have in good faith determined that question, they are not then, so far as the law goes, conspirators. But if it should further appear that the supposed authority was used, not in the interests of the twelve, but to further a personal ambition or > malice of the two, it would no longer justify their conduct. Doing a thing under cloak of authority is not doing it with authority. The injury of the two to the employer, in such an instance, would only be aggravated by their treachery to the associated twelve, and both the employer and employes should, with equal insistence, ask for the visitation of the law."

That a distinction is to be and is made between the mutual rights of employer and employe where a strike or lockout exists, on the one hand, and where neither strike nor lockout exists, on the other hand, is evidenced not only by the language of Judge Grosscup in the case of Iron Moulders' Union No. 125, et al. v. Allis-Chalmers Company, 166 Fed. 52, 53, and from his language in his Charge to the Grand Jury, hereinbefore referred to (62 Fed. 831, 832, 833), but in Illinois by legislative enactment it was sought to divide employers arbitrarily into two classes, one class where a strike or lockout exists, and another class where no strike or lockout exists. Section 8 of the Act that was then in question before the Supreme Court of Illinois read—"In no case shall the superintendent of any free employment office created by this act furnish, or cause to be furnished, workmen or other employes to any applicant for help whose employes are at that time on strike, or locked out; nor shall any list of names and addresses of applicants for employment be shown to any employer whose employes are on strike or locked out; nor shall such list be exposed where it can be copied or used by an employer whose employes are on strike or locked out."

And in deciding the Act invalid, the Court said that that section was a provision—

> "in aid of strikes and strikers, whether right or wrong, and regardless of the justice or the propriety of the strike or lockout." See Mathews v. People (1903), 202 Ill. 389, 63 L. R. A. 73, 76, 78, 79.

Without undertaking to assign the reason for the difference as was done by the Court and by Judge Grosscup in deciding the case of Iron Moulders' Union No. 125, et al. v. Allis-Chalmers Company, 166 Fed. 45, Judge Goff in deciding the case of Mackall v. Ratchford et al. (C. C., D. West Virginia, 1897), 82 Fed. 41, 42, said with respect to the right of persuasion:

> "The strikers had the right to quit work themselves, and they had the right to induce other miners, by peaceable means, by the persuasive force of public or private argument exerted in a lawful way, to also quit work and join them."

In the case of Union Pacific Railway Company v. Ruef et al. (C. C., D. Nebraska, 1902), 120 Fed. 102, 114, Judge McPherson said:

> "Defendants have the right to argue or discuss with the new employes the question whether the new employes should work for the company. They have the right to persuade them if they can. But in presenting the matter they have no right to use force or violence. They have no right to terrorize or intimidate the new employes. The new employes have the right to come and go as they please, without fear or molestation, and without being compelled to discuss this or any other question, and without being guarded or picketed; and persistent and continued and objectionable persuasion by numbers is of itself intimidating and not allowable."

And it is to be remembered that persistent, continued, and objectionable persuasion by one or by many as the United Mine Workers think best is what is sought to be legalized by these defendants.

In the same case, speaking of the right of freedom of contract between employer and employe, Judge McPherson held:

> "The law upholds and will protect the right of freedom of contract between employer and employе; the right of every person or corporation to hire and discharge men at pleasure, subject to liability for damages for breach of contract, and the right of every man to work or to quit work at his pleasure, subject to the same liability, making no distinction between union and non-union workmen."

In the same case (120 Fed. 113) Judge McPherson said:

"The fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States provides that 'no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law;' thereby meaning that neither Congress nor any other governmental agency shall ever deprive any person of either liberty or property excepting by due process of law. And the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States provides that 'no State shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.' And the word 'person' means also a corporation, as many times decided by the United States Supreme Court.

"And that one's business is his or its property is likewise elementary, and is conceded by all. And that liberty means the right to do as he pleases, when he interferes with the rights of no other person, and the right to make contracts with all persons upon all subjects-matter, save and excepting with reference to immoral and unlawful matters, is also conceded by all who know anything of the propositions. And as to what the rights of property mean, and of what liberty of contract consists, of all that has been written upon these all-important and most vital questions there is no paper of greater ability, evidencing more learning, than the very recent opinion of the Supreme Court of Wisconsin in the case of State v. Kreutzberg, 90 N. W., 1098."

In Goldfield Consolidated Mines Company v. Goldfield Miners' Union No. 220, et al. (C. C., D. Nevada, 1908), 159 Fed. 500, 514, Judge Farrington said:

"It is a constitutional right of an employer to refuse to have business relations with any person or with any labor organization, and it is immaterial what his reasons are, whether good or bad, well or ill founded, or entirely trivial and whimsical."

On page 515, he further said:

"The right of master and servant to enter into contracts, to agree upon the terms and conditions under which the one will employ and the other will labor, is property."

And again on the same page, he said:

"The right of an employer to refuse to employ any particular individual, or any class of individuals, is neither greater nor less than the right of a man to refuse to work for any particular individual, or class of individuals. The reason for the refusal can in no wise control, enlarge, or diminish the legal right of refusal, the right to employ, or the right to refuse to be employed."

And he quotes approvingly. 2 Cooley on Torts, p. 587, as follows:

"It is a part of every man's civil right that he be left at liberty to refuse business relations with any person whomsoever, whether the refusal rests upon reason, or is the result of whim, caprice, prejudice, or malice. With his reasons neither the public nor third persons have any legal concern. It is also his right to have business relations with any one with whom he can make contracts."

And on the subject of persuasion, Judge Farrington said (page 519):

"Each party has the right to enter into lawful competition for the support of the non-union miners, and to endeavor by peaceful argument or persuasion to secure their co-operation, provided, the persuasion is of such a character as to leave the person solicited feeling free to do as he pleases, and he is not persuaded to do that which in him would be unlawful. This is so, because workmen, when free from contract obligations, have a legal right, singly, collectively, or as a union, to quit work; that is, to strike, and, having this right, they have the further right to use such lawful means to make the strike effective as are not inconsistent with the rights of others. Karges Furniture Co. v. Amalgamated Woodworkers' Union, 165 Ind., 421; 75 N. E., 877; 2 L. R. A. (N. S.), 788; 18 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. (2d Ed.), 88. The mining company has the right to employ non-union men to take the places vacated by those who quit work. The latter have no legal interest or concern in the contract between the company and its new employes. The places which they vacated to strike are no longer theirs, and never again will be theirs unless they are re-employed. It is difficult to see, when a man has voluntarily given up a job, how he can maintain that he has a shadow of claim or right to the vacated place. Union Pac. R. Co. v. Ruef (C. C.), 120 Fed., 102, 128."

We call attention to Judge Farrington's language that where the relationship of employer and employe has been finally terminated, the striker has nothing to do with the contract the employer may make with his new employe. The Allis-Chalmers Company case (166 Fed., 45) deals with the rights of strikers, and the right of the strikers to use persuasion is permitted by Judge Grosscup owing to the anomalous relationship still existing between the employer and the employe, resultant upon a pending strike. Judge Grosscup himself, however, recognizes that the striker's right to persuade ceases when the striker finally terminates his relationship with his employer.

In Adams v. Brenan et al. (1898), 177 Ill., 194; 42 L. R. A., 718, the Supreme Court of Illinois held:

> "A provision that none but union labor shall be employed cannot be lawfully made in a contract by a public corporation, such as a board of education, as it constitutes a discrimination between different > classes of citizens, and is of such a nature as to restrict competition and to increase the cost of the work."

Per contra: Only non-union labor could not be so employed.

And Judge Cartwright, in delivering the opinion of the Court in that case, said:

> "No question concerning the merits of labor or trades unions is in any way involved in this case. The right of organization for mutual benefit in all lawful ways is not denied. The question is whether the board of education has a right to enter into a combination with such an organization for the expenditure of the taxpayers' money for the benefit of members of the organization, and to exclude any portion of the citizens following lawful trades and occupations from the right to labor. It has no such right."

In the case of Jacobs, as President of the Protective Coat Tailors' & Pressers' Union, v. Cohen et al. (1905), 183 N. Y. 207, 76 N. E. 5, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 292, the New York Court of Appeals held that a contract by a manufacturer to employ as laborers none but members of a particular labor union is not void as against public policy.

Per contra: A like contract to employ only non-union men is lawful.

But the labor union itself would be unlawful if as a combination it extends so far as to inflict injury upon others, or to oppress and crush them by excluding them from all employment, unless gained through joining the labor organization or trades union. Id. 2. L. R. A. (N. S.) 294. And if such a labor union, rendered unlawful for such reasons, were to become subject to the Anti-Trust Law owing to its interference with interstate commerce engaged in by employers with whom the union might be strong enough to compel a contract for the employment of necessary labor whereby to enable the employer to embark in business, or if already in business, then to enable him to continue therein, any such contract to employ only members of that particular union would be unlawful and could not be enforced under the authority of the case of Continental Wall Paper Company v. Louis Voight & Sons Company, decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, February 1, 1909, 212 U. S., 227, 53 L. Ed., 486, 29 S. C. 280.

In the case of State of Missouri v. Julow (1895), 129 Mo., 163, 31 S. W. 781, 29 L. R. A. 257, the Supreme Court of Missouri decided that a right to insist that employes shall withdraw from or refrain from joining any trade union or labor union as a condition of employment or continued employment, is within the constitutional rights of an employer.

In the case of Gillespie v. People of the State of Illinois (1900), 188 Ill. 176, 52 L. R. A. 283, the Supreme Court held a statute void which made it unlawful to prevent, or attempt to prevent, an employe from joining any lawful labor organization, or to discharge an employe because of his connection with such an organization, and providing a penalty therefor, since the right to terminate a contract, subject to liability to respond in a civil action for an unwarranted termination, is within the protection of the provisions of the State and Federal Constitutions, which guarantee that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. The Court held that there was an unconstitutional discrimination in favor of union workmen.

In the case of State v. Kreutzberg (1902), 114 Wis. 530, 90 N. W. 1098, 58 L. R. A. 748, the Supreme Court of Wisconsin held that a statute forbidding, under penalty, an employer from discharging an employe because he is a member of a labor organization, violates the constitutional guaranty of liberty.

Speaking of the constitutional rights of life, liberty, and property, Judge Dodge, delivering the opinion of the Court, said (58 L. R. A. 753, 754):

> "Free will in making private contracts and even in greater degree in refusing to make them, is one of the most important and sacred of the individual rights intended to be protected. That the present act curtails it directly, seriously, and prejudicially, cannot be doubted. The success in life of the employer depends on the efficiency, fidelity, and loyalty of his employes. Without enlarging upon or debating the relative advantages or disadvantages of the labor union, either to its members or to the community at large, it is axiomatic that an employer cannot have undivided fidelity, loyalty, and devotion to his interests from an employe who has given to an association right to control his conduct. He may by its decisions be required to limit the amount of his daily product. He may be restrained from teaching his art to others. He may be forbidden to work in association with other men whose service the employer desires. He may not be at liberty to work with such machines or upon such materials or products as the employer deems essential to his success. In all these respects he may be disabled from the full degree of usefulness attributable to the same abilities in another who had not yielded up to an association any right to restrain his freedom of will and exertion in his employer's behalf according to the latter's wishes. Such considerations an employer has a right to deem valid reasons for preferring not to jeopardize his success by employing members of organizations. A man who has by agreement or otherwise shackled any of his faculties—even his freedom of will—may well be considered less useful or less desirable by some employers than if free and untrammeled. Whether the workman can find in his membership in such organizations advantages and compensations to offset his lessened desirability in the industrial market is a question each must decide for himself. His right to freedom in so doing is of the same grade and sacredness as that of the employer to consent or refuse to employ him according to the decision he makes. We must not forget that our government is founded on the idea of equality of all individuals before the law. Such restraints as may be placed on one may be placed on another. If the liberty of the employer to contract or refuse to contract may be denied, so may that of the employe. In answering the question now before us, we may not forget the possibility of being called on to answer whether the legislature may make a criminal of the employe who quits, for example, because his employer joins a blacklisting association; because non-union men or members of some other union are employed, or non-union or forbidden machines or materials are used; because of an obnoxious foreman; because excessive hours of work are required; because compelled to trade at employer's store or board at his boarding house; or because of any other fact or conduct now considered entirely adequate reason for refusing or leaving a particular service. It must not be forgotten, if, as counsel for the State argues, the laborer is too weak to meet the employer on equal terms in the field of contract, that he will be far more subject to the latter's control and oppression in the field of politics, and that laws of the above character will surely come, if within the proper province of the legislature, unless, as we have faith to believe, the character and the individuality of the wage earners of the country are sufficient to maintain their independence—both contractual and political—in a field of equal rights under the law, and of full liberty to each to sell and buy labor to and from whom he will."

an employe because he belongs to a lawful labor organization, and which provides for the recovery of damages for such discharge, is void. The right to terminate a contract is within the protection of the State and Federal Constitutions, which guarantee to every citizen the protection of life, liberty, and property.

The Coffeyville Vitrified Brick & Tile Company was a corporation engaged in manufacturing brick. It discharged Perry, one of its employes, and he brought suit under the statute. He claimed he had been discharged because he was a member of a labor organization. In holding the statute unconstitutional, Judge Greene, who delivered the opinion of the Court, said:

> "The right to follow any lawful vocation, and to make contracts, is as completely within the protection of the Constitution as the right to hold property free from unwarranted seizure, or the liberty to go when and where one will. One of the ways of obtaining property is by contract. The right, therefore, to contract cannot be infringed by the legislature without violating the letter and spirit of the Constitution. Every citizen is protected in his right to work where and for whom he will; he may not only select his employer, but his associates. He is at liberty to refuse to continue to serve one who has in his employ a person, or an association of persons, objectionable to him. In this respect the rights of the employer and the employe are equal. Any act of the legislature that would undertake to impose on an employer the obligation of keeping one in his service whom, for any reason, he does not desire, would be a denial of his constitutional right to make and terminate contracts and to acquire and hold property. Equally so would be an act the provisions of which were intended to require one to remain in the service of another whom he did not desire to serve."

Judge Greene also said:

> "The business conducted by the defendant was its property, and in the exercise of this ownership it is protected by the Constitution. It could abandon or discontinue its operation at pleasure. It had the right, beyond the possibility of legislative interference, to make any contract with reference thereto not in violation of law. In the operation of its property it may employ such persons as are desirable, and discharge without reason those who are undesirable. It is at liberty to contract for the services of persons in any manner that is satisfactory to both. No legislative restrictions can be imposed upon the lawful exercise of these rights."

In the case of People of the State of New York v. Marcus (1906), 185 N. Y. 257, 77 N. E. 1073, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 282, the New York Court of Appeals decided that a statute forbidding an employer to exact an agreement from an employe not to join a labor union infringes his constitutional rights of liberty.

Per contra: To exact an agreement not to join a union is lawful.

And a fortiori, to join a particular union which is hostile to the employer.

In the case of Delz v. Winfree (1891), 80 Texas 400, 26 Am. St. Rep. 755, the Supreme Court of Texas held:

> "The absolute right of a person to refuse to have business relations with any person whomsoever, whether the refusal is based upon reason or is the result of whim, caprice, prejudice, or malice, must be limited to the individual action of the party who asserts the right. It is not equally true that one person may from such motives influence another person to do the same thing."

In the case of State v. Glidden (1887), 55 Conn. 46, 8 Atl. 890, 3 Am. St. Rep. 23, "An information alleged that the defendants conspired to threaten and use means (the boycott) to intimidate the Carrington Publishing Company, to compel it, against its will, to abstain from doing an act (to keep in its employ workmen of its own choice) which it had a legal right to do, and to do an act (employ the defendants and such persons as they should name) which it had a legal right to abstain from doing: held, that, looking at the transaction as it appeared on the face of the information, the defendants' purpose was to deprive the publishing company of its liberty to carry on its business in its own way, although in doing so it interfered with no right of the defendants; the motive was to gain an advantage unjustly and at the expense of others, and therefore the act was legally corrupt; and as a means of accomplishing the purpose, the parties intended to harm the publishing company, and therefore it was malicious."

In the case of O'Brien v. People (1905), 216 Ill. 354, 75 N. E. 108, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 966, 108 Am. St. Rep. 219, 220, 221, the Supreme Court of Illinois held that:

> "No person or combination of persons can legally, by direct or indirect means, obstruct or interfere with another in the conduct of his lawful business, and any attempt to compel an individual, firm or corporation to execute an agreement to conduct his business through certain agencies, or by a particular class of employes is not only unlawful and actionable, but is also an interference with the exercise of the highest civil right."

And it was also held in that case that "An attempt to coerce a person to sign an agreement to conduct his business by employing only members of a labor union, under a threat of ordering a strike, is unlawful, and such an agreement is voidable for duress, and is violative of the legal rights of both the employer and the non-union employe." And "The right to enter into contracts for labor, or to labor, is both a liberty, and a property right."

IN THE HITCHMAN CASE BOTH A LIBERTY AND A PROPERTY RIGHT ARE BEING INTERFERED WITH.

A labor union may force itself upon a non-union employer in several ways. It may resort to the primary boycott, or to the secondary boycott. And either the primary or the secondary boycott may be of the non-union product. If, of a coal operator, the primary boycott of the product is attempted, it would be of little avail as a coercive measure because the individual consumer of coal is a small factor. For like reason, a secondary boycott of the coal would be ineffective. But the primary boycott through the coal operator's labor supply is entirely possible if all men can be gotten to join the union. Much more so may the secondary boycott be made effective through the coal operator's labor supply, for in such case, while the Union's membership and power may not be at high tide throughout the entire country, or in its greatest field of its endeavor, it might be all powerful in the particular locality where the recalcitrant operator is located. Therefore, the United Mine Workers of America seek to have, and to require, all men working in or around every mine to join their Union, for a monopoly of supply makes the primary as well as the secondary boycott possible, inasmuch as the scale must then be signed with the Union. So, inducing non-union men to join the Union illustrates that situation in the creation of monopolies where the doing of an act, otherwise lawful, becomes unlawful because done to promote an unlawful end. Note the significance of the following provisions:

> "One of the objects of this organization is to unite all employes in and around the coal mines of Ohio and the Pan Handle District of West Virginia."—Section 2 of Article I, Constitution of District No. 6, United Mine Workers of America.
>
> "All men are eligible and must be members of the United Mine Workers of America who work in and around the mines."—Section 3 of Article I, Constitution of Sub-District 5 of District 6, United Mine Workers of America.

"As the mine workers of the entire country are competitors in the labor world, I promise to cease work at any time I am called upon by the organization to do so."—Obligation of Membership, United Mine Workers of America.

But to effectuate the secondary boycott through plaintiff's labor supply, the United Mine Workers must get, not only all men to join the Union, but with all men must be included plaintiff's employes. In getting plaintiff's employes to join the Union, the defendants must interfere with the contractual relations existing between plaintiff and its employes, which forbid the men joining that Union. Hence, a double wrong is done in the present effort of the United Mine Workers to force themselves into contractual relations with plaintiff, which does not want, and has repeatedly refused to have, anything whatever to do with them.

In the case of Martell v. White et al. (1904), 185 Mass. 255, 69 N. E. 1085, 64 L. R. A. 260, 262, the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts held that an action will lie on behalf of a quarry owner against members of a voluntary association of dealers in stone of which he is not a member who enforce a by-law of the association imposing a fine upon members who deal with those who are not members, so that members who desire to deal with non-members are coerced from doing so, to the ruination of the business of the quarry owner.

In deciding this case, Judge Hammond, who delivered the opinion of the Court, said:

"It is elemental that the unlawfulness of a conspiracy may be found either in the end sought, or the means to be used. If either is unlawful, within the meaning of the term as applied to the subject, then the conspiracy is unlawful. It becomes necessary, therefore, to examine into the nature of the conspiracy in this case, both as to the object sought and the means used.

"The case presents one phase of a general subject which gravely concerns the interests of the business world, and, indeed, those of all organized society, and which in recent years has demanded and received great consideration in the Courts and elsewhere. Much remains to be done to clear the atmosphere, but some things, at least, appear to have been settled; and certainly at this stage of the judicial inquiry it cannot be necessary to enter upon a course of reasoning or to cite authorities in support of the proposition that, while a person must submit to competition, he has the right to be protected from malicious interference with his business."

In another place, Judge Hammond said:

"The justification must be as broad as the act, and must cover, not only the motive and the purpose, or, in other words, the object sought, but also the means used.

"The defendants contend that, both as to object and means, they are justified by the law applicable to business competition. In considering this defense it is to be remembered, as was said by Bowen, L. J., in Mogul S. S. Co. v. McGregor, L. R. 23 Q. B. Div. 598, 611, that there is presented 'an apparent conflict or antinomy between two rights that are equally regarded by the law—the right of the plaintiffs to be protected in the legitimate exercise of their trade, and the right of the defendants to carry on their business as seems best to them, provided they commit no wrong to others.' Here, as in most cases where there is a conflict between two important principles, either of which is sound, and to be sustained within proper bounds, but each of which must finally yield, to some extent, to the other, it frequently is not possible by a general formula to mark out the dividing line with reference to every conceivable case, and it is not wise to attempt it. The best and only practicable course is to consider the cases as they arise, and, bearing in mind the grounds upon which the soundness of each principle is supposed to rest, by a process of elimination and comparison to establish points through which, at least, the line must run, and beyond which the party charged with trespass shall not be allowed to go."

The case of Swift & Company et al. v. United States (1905), 196 U. S. 375, 49 L. ed. 518, 524, 25 S. C. 276, illustrates the use of expedients lawful in themselves, which become unlawful by reason of the thing to be accomplished. Swift & Company et al. controlled about six-tenths of the whole trade and commerce in fresh meats among the States, Territories, and District of Columbia, and, but for the acts charged would have been in free competition with one another. In order to restrain competition among themselves as to the purchase of live stock, defendants required their respective purchasing agents at the stock yards to refrain from bidding against each other, except perfunctorily and without good faith. By this means they compelled the owners of stock to sell at less prices than they would have received if the bidding had been really competitive. And to induce stock owners in other states to make large shipments to the stock yards, they, the defendants, combined to bid up, through their agents, the prices of live stock for a few days at a time, so that the market reports would show prices much higher than the state of the trade would warrant. Following such a manoeuver, the stock owners would send in their stock and then the defendants would apply the other rule and the buyers would bid only perfunctorily and without good faith, and the stock would then be bought in at much less prices than it would otherwise have brought had the bidding really been competitive.

The act of the bidding whether high or low was within the right of each defendant, but the wrongfulness consisted in the use to which that right was put. It was contended that such a scheme was within the law against unlawful restraints of trade and monopolies, and Mr. Justice Holmes, delivering the opinion of the Court, said:

> "The scheme as a whole seems to us to be within reach of the law. The constituent elements, as we have stated them, are enough to give to the scheme a body and, for all that we can say, to accomplish it. Moreover, whatever we may think of them separately, when we take them up as distinct charges they are alleged sufficiently as elements of the scheme. It is suggested that the several acts charged are lawful, and that intent can make no difference. But they are bound together as the parts of a single plan. The plan may make the parts unlawful. Aiken v. Wisconsin, 195 U. S. 194, 206, ante, 154, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 3. The statute gives this proceeding against combinations in restraint of commerce among the States and against attempts to monopolize the same. Intent is almost essential to such a combination, and is essential to such an attempt. Where acts are not sufficient in themselves to produce a result which the law seeks to prevent—for instance, the monopoly—but require further acts in addition to the mere forces of nature to bring that result to pass, an intent to bring it to pass is necessary in order to produce a dangerous probability that it will happen. Com. v. Peaslee, 177 Mass. 267, 272, 59 N. E. 55. But when that intent and the consequent dangerous probability exist, this statute, like many others, and like the common law in some cases, directs itself against that dangerous probability as well as against the completed result."

In petitioner's case now at the bar of this Court, the bill has been framed so as to allege successive elements of a single connected scheme, and the collective effect of all of these facts is there set forth. It is further then alleged in the bill that the effort of these defendants and of the United Mine Workers of America, over which the present controversy between the plaintiff and the defendants exists, is "to compel all miners and mine workers to join the Union, establish a monopoly and force employers of that kind of labor, and especially to force your orator, to yield to the Union's demands, or else to give up its business."

In deciding the case of Swift & Company v. United States, above referred to, Mr. Justice Holmes said (196 U. S. 396):

> "Intent is almost essential to such a combination, and is essential to such an attempt. Where acts are not sufficient in themselves to produce a result which the law seeks to prevent,—for instance, the monopoly,—but require further acts in addition to the mere forces of nature to bring that result to pass, an intent to bring it to pass is necessary in order to produce a dangerous probability that it will happen."

The case of Aikens v. Wisconsin (1904), 195 U. S. 194, 49 L. ed. 154, 25 S. C. 3, is instructive and to the point.

In that case there were two other cases of similar character, and they were all heard together, being on writs of error to the Supreme Court of Wisconsin, brought to set aside convictions and sentences of the plaintiffs in error, the defendants below, upon informations filed by the district attorney, which informations had been brought under the Wisconsin statutes, which impose imprisonment or fine on "any two or more persons who shall combine * * * for the purpose of wilfully or maliciously injuring another in his reputation, trade, business, or profession, by any means whatever," etc.

Mr. Justice Holmes, in delivering the opinion of the Court, said:

> "The plaintiffs in error were severally charged with unlawfully combining together with the intent of wilfully and maliciously injuring The Journal Company, a corporation, and certain persons named, stockholders and officers of the company, in their trade and business. It was alleged that the company was publisher of a newspaper in Milwaukee, and had notified an increase of about 25 per cent in its charges for advertising, and that thereupon the plaintiffs in error, who were managers of other newspapers in the same place, in pursuance of their combination, and with the intent of wilfully, maliciously, and unlawfully injuring The Journal Company and the others named, agreed as follows: If any person should agree to pay the increased rate to The Journal Company, then he should not be permitted to advertise in any of the other three newspapers except at a corresponding increase of rate; but if he should refuse to pay The Journal Company the increased rate, then he should be allowed to advertise in any of the other three papers at the rate previously charged. It was alleged that this conspiracy was carried out, and that much damage to the business of The Journal Company ensued."

The defendants admitted the combination, the intent to injure The Journal Company and the resulting damage, but alleged that the combination was entered into in trade competition, and that the parties had the right to make it under the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

In affirming the judgment of the Supreme Court of Wisconsin, in each of those three cases, the Supreme Court of the United States, in an opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Holmes, said (195 U. S. 205, 206):

> "It would be impossible to hold that the liberty to combine to inflict such mischief, even upon such > intangibles as business or reputation, was among the rights which the 14th Amendment was intended to preserve." And again: "Where the acts consist of making a combination calculated to cause temporal damage, the power to punish such acts, when done maliciously, cannot be denied because they are to be followed and worked out by conduct which might have been lawful if not preceded by the acts. No conduct has such an absolute privilege as to justify all possible schemes of which it may be a part. The most innocent and constitutionally protected of acts or omissions may be made a step in a criminal plot, and if it is a step in a plot, neither its innocence nor the Constitution is sufficient to prevent the punishment of the plot by law."

The case of the United States ex rel. Guaranty Trust Company of New York v. Haggerty et al., 116 Fed. 510, is pertinent. In that case, the United Mine Workers were endeavoring to organize non-union mines of the Clarksburg Fuel Company, and having been restrained in that work, the defendants pleaded that freedom of speech was being denied to them. That same idea is advanced by counsel for the defendants in the case at bar. Judge Jackson disposed of that point when raised in the Haggerty case in language which, we think, will appeal to the Court in this case. Judge Jackson said (116 Fed. 517):

> "It is idle for this class of people to attempt to shield themselves, from not only a just criticism of their principles, but from their violations of law and order, by citing and relying upon the principles contained in our immortal Declaration of Independence, inspired by the pen of Thomas Jefferson, and also the first article to the amendment of the Constitution of the United States protecting 'freedom of speech.' The rightful exercise of freedom of speech is not denied, but the abuse of it. Its unrestricted license has always been open to the animadversion and condemnation of the law."

And again on the point that the Court in the case at bar should consider the motive of the defendants, and whether the acts which they claim the right to do, would, if allowed, bring about a dangerous probability that the defendants will finally effect their unlawful purpose, Judge Jackson's language in the Haggerty case (116 Fed. 516, 517) is likewise in point:

> "It is apparent that, if these agitators are permitted to interfere with the orderly, well-disposed miners who are anxious to work, and contented with the wages they receive, in the end this contented class of miners would, through fear, intimidation, as well as threats, be induced to throw down their shovels and picks, and cease to work in the mines," &c.

In the case of Moran v. Dunphy (1901), 177 Mass. 485, 59 N. E. 125, 52 L. R. A. 115, Mr. Justice Holmes, of this Court, but then Chief Justice of the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court, rendering the opinion of the Court, said (52 L. R. A. 116, 117):

> "We apprehend that there no longer is any difficulty in recognizing that a right to be protected from malicious interference may be incident to a right arising out of a contract, although a contract, so far as performance is concerned, imposes a duty only on the promisor. Again, in the case of a contract of employment, even when the employment is at will, the fact that the employer is free from liability for discharging the plaintiff does not carry with it immunity to the defendant who has controlled the employer's action to the plaintiff's harm. The notion that the employer's immunity must be a non-conductor, so far as any remoter liability was concerned, troubled some of the judges in Allen v. Flood (1898), A. C. 1, but is disposed of for this commonwealth by the cases cited. See, also, May v. Wood, 172 Mass. 11, 14, 15, 51 N. E. 191. So again, it may be taken to be settled by Plant v. Woods, 176

Mass. 492, 501, 502, 51 L. R. A. 339, 57 N. E. 1011, that motives may determine the question of liability; that while intentional interference of the kind supposed may be privileged if for certain purposes, yet, if due only to malevolence, it must be answered for. On that point the judges were of one mind. See 176 Mass. 504, 51 L. R. A. 344, 57 N. E. 1011. Finally, we see no sound distinction between persuading by malevolent advice and accomplishing the same result by falsehood or putting in fear. In all cases the employer is controlled through motives created by the defendant for the unprivileged purpose. It appears to us not to matter which motive is relied upon. If accomplishing the end by one of them is a wrong to the plaintiff, accomplishing it by either of the others must be equally a wrong."

And right here, we want to emphasize the point of view of Chief Justice Holmes that persuading by malevolent advice is equivalent to force or fraud. 6 Current Law, 1708. We want further to call the attention of the Court to the fact that this case of Moran v. Dunphy is cited favorably and relied upon by the Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia in the case of Thacker Coal & Coke Company v. Burke et als.

TO INDUCE PLAINTIFF'S EMPLOYES TO JOIN THE UNION IS TO INDUCE THEM TO PLACE THEMSELVES IN A POSITION WHERE THEY CANNOT PERFORM THEIR CONTRACT. HENCE, TO INDUCE THEM TO JOIN IS TO INDUCE THEM TO QUIT THE PLAINTIFF'S EMPLOYMENT.

And if defendants are permitted to persuade plaintiff's employes to join their Union, then plaintiff is deprived of the services of its men as fast as it can employ them.

Both a liberty and a property right are, therefore, at stake.

XII.

ANTI-TRUST LAW.

Judge Dayton said:

> "All the evidence in this voluminous record goes to show pretty conclusively that the fourteen years' struggle of this labor organization since it entered into the compact with the operators of Ohio, western Pennsylvania, Indiana and Illinois in 1898 to unionize the operations in West Virginia has not been in the interest either of the betterment of mine labor in the State or of upholding that free commerce in coal between the States guaranteed by Federal law, but to restrain and even destroy it in West Virginia for the benefit of these unionized competitive States. It may be unfortunate for those States that nature has favored West Virginia, Kentucky and other southern States by giving them better coal and less expensive mining conditions, but this does not warrant the operators and miners there to combine and confederate for the purpose of depriving the consuming public of the right to purchase the better coal at the lower cost, if desired. Such a combination is clearly a common law conspiracy, too far reaching to be reasonable, in restraint of trade, as well, in my judgment, a direct violation of the Sherman Anti-Trust Law."

The Circuit Court of Appeals reached an opposite conclusion, and held that there was no conspiracy, and in addition said:

> "We do not understand that a private person can question the validity of a combination or conspiracy under the Sherman Anti-Trust Law for the purpose of having the same declared to be unlawful."

"It is now provided by the Clayton Act that any person, firm, corporation, or association shall be entitled to sue for and have injunctive relief, in any Federal Court having jurisdiction over the parties, against threatened loss or damage by a violation of the anti-trust laws when and under the same principles as injunctive relief against threatened conduct that will cause loss or damage is granted by courts of equity, under the rules governing such proceedings, and upon the execution of a proper bond and showing that the danger of irreparable loss or damage is immediate, a preliminary injunction may issue. Equity suits, however, against common carriers subject to the Interstate Commerce Act, except on behalf of the Government, are not authorized. Clayton Act (Act of October 15, 1914), Sect. 16.

"Prior to the date of the Clayton Act, it was, however, decided in a number of cases, that except in cases involving general equity jurisdiction, a private person had no right to bring a bill in equity under the Sherman Law, the Government at that time being the only party who could obtain injunctive relief under its provisions. Curtis' Manual of the Sherman Law and Federal Anti-Trust Acts, § 370.

The defendants are not immune under the Clayton Act. Sec. 20 relates to cases between an employer and employes, or between employers and employes, or between employes, or between persons employed and persons seeking employment. The case at bar is not any one of those.

And the case must be one involving, or growing out of, a dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment. The case at bar does not involve, or grow out of, any dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment between the plaintiff and the defendants. It is not in any sense a labor controversy. The Hitchman Company has no dispute with its employes, and the suit does not arise out of any dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment with any one.

But if it were within Sec. 20 of the Clayton Act, this suit would still come within the exception because it is an injunction suit, brought to prevent irreparable injury to property or to a property right. It is not overlooked that Sec. 6 of the Act says that "the labor of a human being is not a commodity or article of commerce." If that language means that labor is not property, Congress has undertaken to legislate in the teeth of decisions by this Court. In the Slaughter House Cases, 16 Wall. 36, 127 (21 L. ed. 394), in the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Swayne, but respecting a subject as to which there was no controversy, occur these words:

> "Labor is property and as such merits protection. The right to make it available is next in importance to the rights of life and liberty."

It was settled that the right to labor and to make contracts to work is a property right by Adair v. U. S., 208 U. S. 161, 173–175, 28 Sup. Ct. 277, 52 L. ed. 436, 13 Ann. Cas. 764, and Coppage v. Kansas, 236 U. S. 1, 10, 35 Sup. Ct. 240, L. R. A. 1915C, 960, 59 L. ed. 441. Controversy on that subject before this court must be regarded as put at rest by those decisions. The right to work, therefore, is property. It is protected by the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. It is as much property as the more obvious forms of goods and merchandise, stocks and bonds. That it may be also a part of the liberty of the citizen does not affect its character as property. It was said in Coppage v. Kansas, 236 U. S. 1, at page 14, 35 Sup. Ct. 240, at page 243:

> "Included in the right of personal liberty and the right of private property—partaking of the nature of each— is the right to make contracts for the acquisition of property. Chief among such contracts is that of personal employment, by which labor and other services are exchanged for money or other forms of property. If this right be struck down or arbitrarily interfered with, there is a substantial impairment of liberty in the long-established constitutional sense."

The Legislature of the State of Massachusetts passed an Act to make lawful certain agreements between employes and laborers, and to limit the issuing of injunctions in certain cases. By Section 1, it was provided:

> "It shall not be unlawful for persons employed or seeking employment to enter into any arrangements, agreements or combinations with the view of lessening the hours of labor or of increasing their wages or bettering their condition; and no restraining order or injunction shall be granted by any court of the commonwealth or by any judge thereof in any case between an employer and employes, or between employers and employes, or between persons employed and persons seeking employment, or involving or growing out of a dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment, or any act or acts done in pursuance thereof, unless such order or injunction be necessary to prevent irreparable injury to property or to a property right of the party making the application for which there is no adequate remedy at law; and such property or property right shall be particularly described in the application, which shall be sworn to by the applicant or by his agent or attorney."

And by Section 2, it was provided:

> "In construing this act, the right to enter the relation of employer and employe, to change that relation, and to assume and create a new relation for employer and employe, and to perform and carry on business in such relation with any person in any place, or to do work and labor as an employe, shall be held and construed to be a personal and not a property right. In all cases involving the violation of the contract of employment either by the employe or employer where no irreparable damage is about to be committed upon the property or property right of either, no injunction shall be granted but the parties shall be left to their remedy at law."

A contest arose between two labor unions seeking similar employment as laborers in the building trades, and the defendants sought to justify their conduct as legal under that Act.

In disposing of that contention May 19, 1916, the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, in the case of Bogni et al. v. Perotti et al., 112 N. E. Rep. 853, 855, said:

> "That the right to work is property cannot be regarded longer an open question. It was held in in Cornellier v. Haverhill Shoe Mfrs.' Ass'n., 221 Mass. 554, at page 560, 109 N. E. 643, at page 645, that:
>
> "'The right to labor and to its protection from unlawful interference is a constitutional as well as a common law right.'"

And again—

> "No discussion is required to show that it is beyond the power of the Legislature under Constitutions which guard the individual against being deprived of property without due process of law, to declare without any process at all that a well recognized kind of property shall no longer be property. 'Lawful property cannot be confiscated' under the guise of a statute. Durgin v. Minot, 203 Mass. 26–28, 89 N. E. 144, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 241, 133 Am. St. Rep. 276. When legislative attempts to compel the deprivation of certain comparatively small sums of money without due process of law invariably fail (see, for example, Northern Pacific Ry. Co. v. No. Dakota, 236 U. S. 585, 35 Sup. Ct. 429, 59 L. ed. 735; Great Northern Ry. Co. v. Minnesota, 238 U. S. 340, 35 Sup. Ct. 753, 59 L. ed. 1337; Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Ry. v. Wisconsin, 238 U. S. 491, 35 Sup. Ct. 869, 59 L. ed. 1423, L. R. A. 1916A, 133; Louisville & Nashville Rd. v. Central Stockyards Co., 212 U. S. 132, 29 Sup. Ct. 246, 53 L. ed. 441), it is manifest that something recognized as property by the law of the land cannot be extinguished utterly."

And again—

> "A further effect of the present statute is to deprive the plaintiffs of the equal protection of the laws. The statute provides in substance that the property right to labor of any individual or number of individuals associated together shall not be recognized in equity as property when assailed by a labor combination, unless irreparable damage is about to be committed and that no relief by injunction shall be granted save in like cases for which there is no relief at law. That a man cannot resort to equity respecting his property right to work in the ordinary case simply because he is a laboring man, and that he cannot have the benefit of an injunction when such remedies are open freely to owners of other kinds of property, needs scarcely more than a statement to demonstrate that such man is not guarded in his property rights under the law to the same extent as others."

And again—

"It has been argued that since the equitable jurisdiction of the court is largely statutory (Parker v. Simpson, 180 Mass. 334, 350, 62 N. E. 401), it may be curtailed by the Legislature in respect of the power to grant injunctions. It is one thing to affect the scope of equity by extending or restricting the branches of that jurisprudence which courts may administer; it is a quite different matter to enact that some citizens may resort to it, while others may not. Without discussing other aspects of this proposition, it is enough to say that the power of courts to afford injunctive relief cannot be impaired by the Legislature in such a way as to prevent its use in favor of one property owner, when it is preserved for the benefit of other property owners."

The Clayton Act cannot be interpreted as to make no longer property that which this Court has decided is both property and a property right protected by the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States; neither may Congress enact laws whereby the Federal Courts shall be open to some and shall not be open to others of its citizens upon the same terms; and the jurisdiction of the Federal Courts may not be so curtailed as that some citizens may resort to those courts while others may not.

SUMMARY.

Right of this Court to render the decree which the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit should have rendered.

By § 240 of the Judicial Code it is provided that when a case is brought to this Court by certiorari it is here for "review and determination, with the same power and authority in the case as if it had been carried by appeal or writ of error to the Supreme Court." In Harriman v. Northern Securities Co., 197 U. S. 244, it was held that this Court will, by its direction to the Circuit Court, finally dispose of a cause brought before it on writ of certiorari to a Circuit Court of Appeals, where the record presented the whole case to that Court so that it might properly have been finally disposed of by its decree, although it did nothing more than to reverse the decree of the Circuit Court granting a preliminary injunction. In that case, this Court said: "In our opinion the record presented the whole case to that Court in such wise that it might properly have been finally disposed of in terms by its decree, in accordance with the well-settled rule upon that subject. Mast. F. & Co. v. Stover Mfg. Co. 177 U. S. 495; Castner v. Coffman, 178 U. S. 183; Knoxville v. Africa, 77 Fed. 501. * * * In the present case we granted the certiorari, at the instance of complainants before the case had gone back to the Circuit Court, and shall do what the Circuit Court of Appeals might have done—that is, finally dispose of the case by our direction to the Circuit Court."

As it clearly appears from the record of the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of West Virginia, which stands before this Court as a return to the certiorari, that the Judge of said District Court, in the final decree rendered in favor of the plaintiff, sustained and enforced its constitutional contractual rights, according to the construction given to the contract in question by the highest Court of West Virginia, we respectfully insist that said final decree of said District Court should be in all things affirmed by this Court.

Respectfully submitted.

HITCHMAN COAL AND COKE COMPANY, A CORPORATION, Petitioner,

v.

JOHN MITCHELL, individually; T. L. LEWIS, individually; W. B. WILSON, individually, et al., Respondents.

BRIEF IN REPLY TO PETITION AND MOTION FOR CERTIORARI.

Statement.

This Court, upon application for a writ of certiorari to review a decision of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, will examine such application in the light of all the pleadings in the cause, and the competent evidence adduced in support of the issues created by these pleadings. There is a clear statement in the opinion rendering the decision complained of, of the essential allegations of the bill, and the denial thereof contained in the answers of the defendants in the cause.

These issues thus raised by the pleadings may be summarized as follows:

(1.) Is the organization known as "The United Mine Workers of America" unlawful under the Constitution, common and statutory laws of the State of West Virginia?

(2.) Was this organization, at the time of the institution of this suit, engaged in an attempt, by the use of any unlawful means, to induce the petitioner's employes to become members of that organization?

(3.) Was the organization, at the time of the institution of the suit, engaged in an attempt, by the use of unlawful means, to induce the petitioner's employes to cease their employment?

(4.) Was the organization, at the time of the institution of this suit, engaged in an attempt to close down the petitioner's mine without its consent?

No other issues were before the District Court, and no other issues were passed upon in the Circuit Court of Appeals. A great mass of testimony, some relevent, some not, was introduced in the District Court, and brought into the record in the Circuit Court of Appeals in narrative form. The case was treated in the Circuit Court of Appeals as one involving questions of local West Virginia law; and while the District Court based his decision in part upon certain provisions of the Federal Constitution and upon the Sherman Anti-Trust Law (26 Stat. 209), neither of these questions was noticed in the appellate court, further than to observe that there must be a specific allegation of violation of that statute in the pleadings, before its provisions can be bought to bear upon the circumstances of a case; and that, further, that statute cannot be made the basis of an injunction by a private person.

In Mitchell v. Hitchman Coal and Coke Co., 214 Fed. 685, in the opinion at pages 713, 714, it is said:

> "The court below, among other things, expressed the view that the United Mine Workers of America constituted a combination or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce among the several states, or with foreign nations, under what is known as the Sherman Anti-Trust Law (Act July 2, 1890, c. 647, 26 Stat. 209).
> We do not deem it necessary to discuss this > proposition at any great length. In the first place, there is nothing in the pleadings to raise the question as to whether the United Mine Workers of America are liable under the statute question, and any evidence that may have been introduced bearing upon this point was therefore immaterial and should have been rejected. There is another reason why we think that this question cannot under any view of the case arise in this controversy, to-wit, we do not understand that a private person can question the validity of a combination or conspiracy under the Sherman Anti-Trust Law for the purpose of having the same declared to be unlawful "

Then take the concluding paragraph of the stating part of the bill, quoted at length in the petition at page 2, and found in the record accompanying the same at page 31, the last clause of which is as follows:

> "and thereby perpetrate acts of oppression and wrong upon your orator which distinctly violate your orator's contractual common law, statutory and constitutional rights as a citizen of the state of West Virginia."

The petioner is a resident and citizen of the State of West Virginia, and was at the time of the institution of the suit, engaged in mining and selling and shipping coal, from mines owned by it near the City of Wheeling, in that State; interference with the operation of these mines by the respondents is the foundation of this suit. Therefore, it is alleged that the acts charged against the respondents are in violation of the constitution and laws of the State of West Virginia.

Then at page 696 of 214 Fed., the Circuit Court of Appeals makes use of this language:

> "The most important and far-reaching question is raised by the assignment of error wherein it is insisted that the Court below errored in holding that the United Mine Workers of America and its subordinate branches constitute an unlawful organization under the Constitution, the common law and the statutory law of the State of West Virginia."

From this it is clear that the principal legal question before the Circuit Court of Appeals was one to be determined by the laws of the State of West Virginia, and that the subject matter of this suit is personal to the petitioner and other coal operators of that State. And however this cause may be decided, or however it has been decided, whatever view the courts may take as to existing laws of that State on the subject; the whole effect of these decisions, and the whole tenor of these existing laws, could apply only to coal operators doing business in that State; so that the questions decided by the Circuit Court of Appeals as matters of law are not of such general importance as either require or warrant a review of that decision by this Court. And certainly there is no possibility of there ever being a conflict between this decision, and any decisions rendered or which may hereafter be rendered by the other Circuit Courts of Appeals.

This principle applies with peculiar force to the case at bar, because the decision in the Circuit Court of Appeals was based largely upon certain statutory provisions of the State, as shown by the opinion filed with the petition.

As to this feature of the case, at page 706 of 214 Fed., after quoting from the West Virginia Code of 1913, c. 151H, sec. 28, the Court says:

> "As amended it went into effect May 22, 1907, prior to the beginning of the institution of this suit, and this statute was enacted in 1890, the year in which the United Mine Workers of America were organized.
> To say nothing of the legislative intent, the word of the foregoing statute by implication at least recognized labor unions."

Again, upon the same page, after quoting another statute designed to protect "any person, firm or corporation, or any association or union of working men" in the use of a device or trade-mark, "for the purpose of designating, making known, or distinguishing any goods, wares, merchandise, or other product of labor," the Court further says:

> "The fact that the legislature of that state enacted this statute, which had for its purpose the protection of labor unions in the use of what is known as a trademark, clearly indicates that the legislature recognized labor unions as lawful."

The other questions decided upon appeal in this case were purely ones of fact, turning upon the weight to be given to the conflicting testimony of the various witnesses, and upon the proper construction to be placed upon the relevant evidence before the Court.

Argument.

It seems to us that the granting or refusal of the writ of certiorari involves a consideration of the following questions and no others: Is this a case of such gravity and importance as calls for an exercise of the power of the Court to issue the writ? If this be answered affirmatively, Is the organization known as the United Mine Workers of America contrary to the constitution, common and statutory law of West Virginia? Will this Court review a decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals upon a disputed question of fact?

Is this a case of such gravity and importance as calls for an exercise of the power of the Court to issue the writ?

> "So it has been that this court, while not doubting its power, has been chary of its action in respect to certioraris. It has been said: "It is evident that it is solely questions of gravity and importance that the circuit courts of appeals should certify to us for instruction; and that it is only when such questions are involved that the power of this court to require a case in which the judgment and decree of the court of appeals is made final, to be certified, can be properly invoked."
>
> * * * * * * * * * *
> We reaffirm in this case the propositions heretofore announced, to-wit, that the power of this court in certiorari extends to every case pending in the circuit courts of appeal, and may be exercised at any time during such pendency, provided the case is one which but for this provision of the statute would be finally determined in that court. And further, that while this power is co-extensive with all possible necessities and sufficient to secure to this court a final control over the litigation in all the courts of appeal, it is a power which will be sparingly exercised, and only when the circumstances of the case satisfy us that the importance of the question involved, the necessity of avoiding conflict between two or more courts of appeal, or between courts of appeal and the courts of a state, or some matter affecting the interests of this nation in its internal or external relations, demands such exercise."

Forsyth v. Hammond, 166 U. S. 506, 41 L. ed. 1095.

"But we do not regard the inquiry as to whether it was settled law in the State of Minnesota that a judgment of dismissal in a former suit, such as pleaded here, was not a bar to a second suit upon the same cause of action, or whether the law in respect of recovery by a servant against his master for injuries received in the course of his employment was properly applied on the trial of this case, as falling within the category of questions of such gravity and general importance as to require the review of the conclusions of the Circuit Court of Appeals in reference to them."

Ex parte Woods, 143 U. S. 202, 36 L. ed. 125.

Is the organization known as the United Mine Workers of America contrary to the constitution, common and statutory law of West Virginia?

The question as to whether or not the acts alleged against the respondents in petitioner's bill constitute an invasion of petitioner's rights, was one of mixed law and fact, dependent upon whether the acts alleged to have been committed by respondents were proven, and if proven, did they constitute an invasion of petitioner's constitutional rights. The court of appeals found that the testimony did not sustain the allegations of the bill, and it was, therefore, unnecessary to pass upon the question of the invasion of petitioner's constitutional rights.

The proposition that the United Mine Workers of America is an organization unlawful under the common and statutory law of West Virginia, we shall divide into two questions:

I. The common law of West Virginia.
II. The statutory law of West Virginia.

I. The common law of West Virginia.

The common law of England was adopted as the law of West Virginia, only so far as the great body of that law is applicable to the habits and conditions of society and in harmony with the genius, spirit and objects of our institutions.

> "The common law of England, so far as it is not repugnant to the principles of the bill of rights and constitution of the State of Virginia, was in force in that State when the constitution of this State took effect, and is, therefore, the law of the State unless repealed or modified by the general assembly of Virginia or the legislature of this State."

Cunningham v. Dorsey, 3 W. Va., 293.

> "The common law of England is in force in this State only so far as it is in harmony with its institutions, and its principles applicable to the state of the country and the conditions of society."

Powell v. Sims, 5 W. Va. 1.

> "The common law imposes on the owner of domestic animals the duty of keeping them on his own lands, or within enclosures, and he becomes a wrongdoer if any of them escape, or stray off upon the lands of another — Held:
>
> That this common law rule is not in force in West Virginia, it being inconsistent with the legislation of the State, subject to the qualification, > however, that animals which are unruly, or dangerous, are required to be restrained."

>
> Baylor v. B. & O. R. R. Co., 9 W. Va., 270.
>
> Acts which constituted waste under the common law do not constitute waste in West Virginia, as the law of waste in its application here must be accomodated to the circumstances of our own country.
> Findlay v. Smith, 6 Munf. (Va.) 134; McDodrill v. Pardee & Curtin Lumber Co., 40 W. Va., at page 579.

So, the common law doctrine of ancient lights is in applicable to the condition of a growing country such as ours, and is not in force in the Virginias.

> Tunstall v. Christian, 80 Va., at page 4; Cunningham v. Dorsey, 3 W. Va.. 293.

As is said by Chancellor Kent, in volume 1, page 536, of the 12th., edition of his Commentaries, speaking of the common law of England:

> "It has been assumed by the courts of justice, or declared by statute, with the like modifications, as the law of the land in every state."

The State of West Virginia, at the time of her admission into the Union, adopted the common law as it then existed in the State of Virginia; and in a later constitution her people placed the following provision:

> "Such parts of the common law, and of the law, and of the laws of this State as are in force when this article goes into operation, and are not repugnent thereto, shall be and continue the law of the State until altered or repealed by the Legislature."
> W. Va., Const. Art. 8, sec. 21.

Under the first constitution, it has always been held that the decisions of the Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia rendered prior to the separation of the two states are binding authority upon the courts of West Virginia.

> Clarke v. Figgins. 27, W. V., 663.

And since the formation of the State of West Virginia the decisions of the courts of the two states are in accord on practically every question that has come before them involving the application of common law principles; and this, for the reason, as we have seen, that the common law exists with precisely the same modifications in both States. The question involved in the case at bar has never been before the Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.

It has, however, been before the Supreme Court of Virginia, and in Everett Waddey Co. v. Richmond Typographical Union, 105 Va., 188, 53 S. E. 273, that Court made use of the following language:

> "In many of the states of the Union there are statues which provide for the incorporation of trades unions and other labor organizations and in all of them, one of the permissible objects of incorporation is declared to be the securement of better terms of employment; while at common law, as interpetreted by the English decisions and a few of the earliest decisions of the courts of this country, labor combinations formed for the purpose of controlling the rate of wages were regarded as a criminal conspiracy. But these early decisions of the courts of this country were soon departed from by other cases, notably in Massachusetts, New York, and Pennsylvania, which placed labor combinations upon a plane of legal equality with capitalistic combinations, by holding that it was not a criminal conspiracy for workmen to combine for the purpose of enhancing the rate of wages, or for improving in any other way, their relations with employers
>
> It is lawful for workmen to combine to control the terms of their own hiring, and such a combination is easily distinguishable from one in which the purpose is to control the business of the employer in other matters, not affecting the terms of their own hiring; as, for example, the prevention of the employment of nonunion men.
>
> * * * * *
> The authorities, as already noted, hold that a strike is not unlawful; that members of the labor > unions may singly or in a body quit the service of their employer, and, for the purpose of strengthening their association, may persuade and induce others in the same occupation to join their union, and as a means to that end, refuse to allow their members to work in places where nonunion labor is employed."

Accordingly, the Circuit Court of Appeals held that the United Mine Workers, as an organization, was not unlawful under the common law, as adopted in West Virginia, as now applicable in that state.

II. The statutory law of West Virginia.

The court then says, on page 705 of 214 Fed., "nor do we find anything in the statute law of West Virginia to sustain the contention that this organization is illegal."

> "Nor shall any person or persons, or combination of persons, by force, threats, menaces, or intimidation of any kind, prevent or attempt to prevent from working in or about any mine, any person or persons who have the lawful right to work in or about the same, and who desire to so work; but this provision shall not be so construed as to prevent any two or more persens from associating together under the name of knights of labor, or any other name they may desire, for any lawful purpose, or for using moral suasion or lawful argument to induce any one not to work in or about any mine."
> Code, W. Va., 1913, c 15H, Sec. 28.

Speaking of the effect of this statute, in the opinion at page 706, 214 Fed., the Court of Appeals said:

> "As amended it went into effect May 22, 1907, prior to the beginnning of the institution of this suit, and this statute was enacted in 1890, the year in which the United Mine Workers of America were organized.
>

there appears in the Code of 1906, as section 1, c. 62e, serial section 2859, the following language:

'Whenever any person, firm or corporation, or any association or union of working men, has heretofore adopted or used, or shall hereafter adopt or use any label, trade-mark, term, design, or device or form of advertisement for the purpose of designating, making known, or distinguishing any goods, wares, merchandise, or other product of labor, as having been made, manufactured, * * * by such person, firm, corporation or association or union of workingmen, or by a member or members of such association or union, and shall register the same as provided in section three of this act, it shall be unlawful to knowingly counterfeit or imitate such label, trade-mark, term, design, device or form of advertisement, or to knowingly use, sell, offer for sale, or in any way utter or circulate any counterfeit or imitation of any such label, trade-mark, term, design, device or form of advertisement."

The fact that the legislature of that state enacted this statute, which has for its purpose the protection of labor unions in the use of what is known as a trade-mark, clearly indicates that the legislature recognized labor unions as lawful"

And further, on page 707:

"In view of what we have said as to the status of these organizations at common law, and the further fact that there is an implied, if not direct, recognition of labor unions by statute in West Virginia, and there being no enactment declaring the same to be unlawful, we are of the opinion that the court below erred in declaring these organizations to be unlawful at common law."

It is submitted, from the considerations here presented, that the Circuit Court of Appeals could not have done otherwise than hold that the United Mine Workers of America, as an organization is not unlawful in West Virginia.

Will this Court review a decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals upon a disputed question of fact?

An inspection of the opinion of the Circuit Court of Appeals will discloss a number of unlawful acts charged against the respondents, as to which the Court said that "the evidence fails to show any unlawful methods were resorted to by these defendants in this instance."

It will further disclose that the Court carefully weighed all the testimony in the case bearing upon these alleged unlawful acts, some of the most pertinent of which is quoted at length in the opinion; and after careful analysis and mature deliberation, the Court found that the evidence in the case failed to show any unlawful methods were resorted to by these respondents in attempting to promote the growth of their organization by soliciting the petitioner's employes to become members of the United Mine Workers of America, a lawful organization under the laws of the State of West Virginia.

As has been heretofore stated, in order to bring into this case a consideration of any constitutional provision, it would have been necessary that the acts charged to the respondents be proven, and upon this application the Court will not go into the entire record to ascertain whether the findings of fact were unwarranted.

But, be this as it may, in order that a constitutional question may be made the basis of a review of this case by this Court, that question must have been the all controlling one; that is the decision of such a question must have been necessary in order to pass upon the merits of the cause.

> Carey v Houston, etc., R. Co., 160 U. S. 170 37 L. ed. 1041;

Although, if the writ were granted, all other questions would then be open to determination, if inquiry were not rendered unnecessary by the ruling on that arising under the constitution.

> Horner v. United States, 143 U. S. 570, 36 L. ed. 266; Carey v. Houston, etc., R. Co., cited.

So that the Court will not examine into the record in the Circuit Court of Appeals, further than to ascertain if the decision in that Court turned upon a question arising under the Constitution, presented by the pleadings and the facts.

It is not the intention of counsel for the respondents to argue the merits of this controversy, in opposition to the application for a writ of certiorari, but only to present to the Court the reasons that suggest themselves why this case does not call for the issuing of this extraordinary writ.

The organization known as the United Mine Workers of America does not now attempt, nor has it ever attempted, to evade a hearing by this Court, upon the question of its status before the law. On the contrary counsel have been repeatedly assured by the officers and members with whom they have talked, that they are anxious that the legality of their association be passed upon and forever settled.

But this association is unwilling that its cause be disposed of under the laws of West Virginia, or the laws of any other one State, for that matter. They insist that when they come into this Court, it be in a proceeding that will properly involve their standing before the laws of the Nation, wherein the pleadings and proof will bring to the attention of the Court every phase of their organization to which Federal laws may be thought to apply. If such were the case at bar, no opposition would be offered to the issuance of the writ. But growing out of local conditions, and governed almost entirely by local law as it is, this case does not involve the decision of those broad and universal principles which will forever set at rest the question of the right of labor to organize for its protection.

And we now submit that this case is determinable by state laws alone, and was so determined by the Circuit Court of Appeals; that it presents, therefore, no questions of such grave general concern as will move the Court, in the exercise of its discretion, to direct the writ to issue.

Respectfully submitted,

Koch's Exhibit No. 6.

A printed paper having attached to it a typewritten sheet of paper; the paper has upon it the following heading: "Official Mine Scale between the Operators and United Mine Workers of America, for the Panhandle District of West Virginia. All persons accepting employment in this mine hereby agree to be governed by the following rules and regulations. In effect April 1, 1904, and ending March 31, 1906." The typewritten sheet attached to the printed paper just identified has the following heading: "The following local rules are made as a part of the Panhandle scale of W. Va., as adopted for the period April 30, 1904, to March 31, 1906, and are to be recognized as such by both operator and miners interested." And immediately following that heading are four short rules, which read as follows:

"Rule 1. The check weighman, if possible, must be an employee of the company, but should he be chosen from the outside, he must not be objectionable to the company.

"Rule 2. Day labor is allowed to work overtime and to be paid scale price for such overtime. This to be done without any recess between the end of the eight-hour day and the overtime.

"Rule 3. Enough men to report for work and work on holidays, Sundays and days on which a death by accident to an employee

At the foot of that paper and the language, "Signed and agreed to on behalf of the company," is the signature, "W. H. Koch." On the other side of the same sheet of paper, and opposite the signature of W. H. Koch, and under the heading, "Signed and agreed to on behalf of the miners," are the signatures, "James Jarrett, Walter Miller, S. P. Rowand, James Conoway."

Koch's Exhibit No. 7.

A printed paper purporting to be a mine scale between the employees of the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company, and the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company, in effect April 1, 1906, and ending March 31, 1908, and having also at the head, in writing, these words: "All persons accepting employment at the mine hereby agree to be governed by the following rules and regulations." The paper has some modifications of the printed scale by marking in ink of certain figures opposite the printed figures, indicative of the price to be paid for the particular service, and it has crossed out in ink the following language: "Rule 9. We adopt the check-off system as a part of the agreement in this district. This pertains to regular dues and assessments of the U. M. W. of A., but shall not give any right to collect fines unless such fines are ordered by two-thirds of the members of the local union. However, should either the operator, or local union, or the party upon whom the fine is imposed object to said fine, each of them shall have the right of appeal to the sub-district president for a final ruling. Check-off lists shall be handed in at my office not later than 5 p. m., on the 2d and 17th days of each month; otherwise, operators shall not be required to check off same." In addition to having that rule I have just quoted and which is printed, stricken out in ink, the following rule, No. 10, is also stricken out in ink. "Rule No. 10. No strike shall take place at any mine under the jurisdiction of Sub-District 5 of District 6, except for specific violation of agreement. That is, screens irregular; failure to pay on pay day without explanation; violation of mining laws by operators, or reduction from scale wages, until the grievance of the mine affected has been thoroughly investigated by the officers of District 6, U. M. W. of A., and operators interested. Any man or men that cause a stoppage of work at any time in violation of this rule, shall be subject to dismissal at the will of the company." In addition to this rule, No. 10, last referred to as being stricken out in ink, the third paragraph of Rule No. 19 is stricken out in ink. That paragraph reads as follows: "Miner so suspended shall have the right of appeal to officials U. M. W. of A., and operators interested;" and in addition to having that third paragraph of Rule No. 19 stricken out, Rule No. 22 is stricken out in ink. Rule No. 22 reads as follows: "Mines to be placed on a screen basis; run of mine to be paid for on an average of each man's screened coal per day. The price of run of mine from Boggs Run mine shall be 61 cents per car." And in addition to having Rule No. 22, as above, stricken out in ink, Rule No. 25 is also stricken out in ink. Rule No. 25 reads: "No new rule, either local nor general, shall be permitted unless mutually agreed upon by operators and miners interested." Attached to this printed scale is a slip of paper upon which is written: "Rule 22. Run of mine coal used at bin to be paid for at the rate of (32⅓) thirty-two and one-third cents per ton, r. of m." This printed scale has attached to it for the purpose of signature a piece of paper upon which is written: "Hitchman Coal & Coke Company, W. H. Koch, Manager."

HITCHMAN MINE, FACTS ABOUT.
(a) When and why opened, 1902.
By whom opened.
Designed primarily to supply coal to the B. & O. R. R. engines at its yards at Benwood, W. Va., four miles below Wheeling, for which trade a contract was made before the mine was opened. Such coal is termed "Engine Coal."
Secondarily, the mine was designed to ship coal to the general markets, local and otherwise, as its production became great enough in the course of its development to admit of that trade. Such coal is termed "Commercial Coal."

LORAIN COAL & DOCK COMPANY MINES.
(a) Coal was procured from the Lorain Coal & Dock Company's union mines in Ohio by the B. & O. R. R. Co. and furnished to the Hitchman Company to be loaded by it under its contract with the B. & O. over its tipples and into its bins and thence into the engines of the B. & O. at the same time that the Union's officials refused to let the Hitchman miners continue work during the 1906 strike.
This was one of the causes which led the men at the Hitchman mine to break away from the Union.

MINIMUM PRICE FOR COAL.

One of the objects of the U. M. W. of A. is to unite all employes in and around the mines in this country that the organization may fix a minimum wage scale and that the operator be compelled to fix a selling price for his coal which will admit of his paying this minimum wage to the members of the Union for mining coal.

(c) During the spring of 1903 and prior to April 1, 1903, the Hitchman mine was operated "non-union" and Hitchman himself was spending the most of his time running the Mount Pleasant mine in Ohio.

These defendants, Lewis, Sullivan, Savage, Watkins, and Rankin, officers of the United Mine Workers, with whom Hitchman dealt regarding the Mount Pleasant mine, threatened to close down the Mount Pleasant mine unless the management would unionize the Hitchman mine.

So the Hitchman mine was unionized April, 1903, resultant upon that threat, and then there was a strike and the Hitchman mine was idle for 51 days.

EXCERPTS FROM ORIGINAL DOCUMENTS TRANSMITTED TO THIS COURT NOT IN PRINTED RECORD.

Excerpts from Book entitled "Proceedings of Joint Conference of Coal Operators and Coal Miners of Western Pennsylvania, Ohio and Indiana, Cincinnati, Ohio, March 8–29, 1910."

This book is otherwise known in the record of the case of the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company against John Mitchell and others as McKinley's Exhibit No. 4 and as Upstill's Exhibit No. 1. [Record pp. 706, 291, 484, 485.]

(1) "It may be fitting to say at this time, before we proceed with the organization of the convention, to our friends who are here as visitors, to the men in public life and to the great American people through the press representatives who are here, that the eyes of the United States are focused on Cincinnati this week. We have assembled here as representatives of one of the most important industries in the country. We have come here for the purpose of negotiating a wage contract that will directly and indirectly affect half a million men who are wage earners in the coal mines of this country. We have come here for the purpose of negotiating a wage contract to govern an industry whose value cannot be counted in millions, but in hundreds of millions in actual money value. We are here to negotiate a contract the importance of which is second to no other in this country. Every wheel of industry, whether in the mill or the factory or on our transportation lines, revolves as a direct result of the commodity we produce as mine workers, and the commodity the operators are responsible for placing on the market."

Chairman Lewis.
p. 6, l. 48–50.
p. 7, l. 1–15.

(2) "The joint movement may have its defects; it has its good qualities, and if there are any imperfections in it let us work to remedy them. There is one thing to be said for this joint movement, and that is that to our minds it is the most practical solution of the labor problem we have yet discovered. There may be another solution, there may be another time when we will find something more practical than the method we have adopted in the mining industry; but I am unwilling to give this method up and go to work and experiment with another at this time. In other words, I am from Missouri temporarily, and I must not only be shown, but I must be convinced that there is some other method more practical than this before I am willing to surrender this method for another.

"Let us express the hope that when we leave Cincinnati it will be with an agreement that will be reasonably satisfactory to all concerned, and that it will mean industrial peace in the mining industry of our country for two years from April 1, 1910."

Chairman Lewis.
p. 8, l. 1–17.

(3) "Upon the reconvening of the session Mr. Savage, secretary of the Committee on Credentials, reported as follows:

"The report of the committee is not written out, but we are ready to make a verbal report. The full report will be prepared for the two secretaries. The committee organized and elected Mr. P. H. Penna, chairman, and G. W. Savage, secretary. A motion was made that the accredited representatives of Western Pennsylvania, operators and miners; the accredited representatives of Ohio, operators and miners, and the accredited representatives of Indiana, operators and miners, be seated in this convention. That was carried by unanimous vote. Another motion was made that the national officers of the United Mine Workers and the Executive Board members and the Secretaries and Commissioners of the Operators' Associations be seated in the convention.

"Mr. Zerbe, Ohio: That they be seated as ex-officio members.

"On motion the report of the committee was adopted."

p. 10, l. 1–22.

(4) "Fourth. That each state be allowed the same number of votes on the floor of the house—four votes on behalf of the operators and four votes on behalf of the miners in each State.

"Fifth. That no vote be declared carried unless upon the affirmative vote of the miners and operators of each State. That upon all questions of mere procedure the ordinary rules of parliamentary procedure, as stated in any standard manual, shall be the rules of this convention; and that in no event shall the rule requiring unanimous vote on all main and principal questions be suspended. Main and principal questions mean all questions affecting the proposed scale and agreement."

Mr. Dagger, secretary of the Committee on Rules and Order of Business and Permanent Organization—under "RULES."

p. 10, l. 39–46.
p. 11, l. 1–3.

(5) Mr. Lewis, for the miners and representatives, presented the following proposition:

MINERS PROPOSITION

"We, the representatives of the United Mine Workers, present to the Operators for their consideration the following proposition:

"1. That all coal be weighed before being screened and paid for on that basis. The mine-run rate in the different districts shall be at least equivalent to the screen coal prices.

"2. An advance of ten (10) cents per ton for pick mining and an equivalent advance for machine mining and a corresponding increase for all day work, dead work, yardage, etc.

"3. That we demand a uniform rate of wages for all classes of inside and outside day labor. Time and a half for overtime, Sundays and legal holidays.

"4. A change in the present eight hour day work day so as to provide for eight hours from starting time until quitting time, or what is commonly known as from 'bank to bank,' with a half holiday on Saturday.

"5. That the contract period shall be for two years from April 1, 1910.

"6. That all local inequalities and internal differences, both as to prices and conditions, be referred to the districts affected.

"7. That the International officials require all coal companies in the Pittsburg District, where new explosives have been introduced, to comply with all the terms of settlement made with the Charleroi Coal Company and the officials of our organization on the explosive question, by either paying the miners on run-of-mine basis, or granting an increase of $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent to miners working in wide rooms and 9 per cent in narrow rooms, and that the miners be furnished the new explosives at the same relative cost as black powder, which was formerly used, and where shot-firers are employed the company shall pay their wages, and that the International officers give the matter immediate attention.

"8. There shall be no limit to the amount of deductions for the organization.

"9. That no district under the control of the United Mine Workers be permitted to enter into an agreement to reimburse the operators for any money expended for labor, directly or indirectly, wherein the law says the expense shall be borne by the operators.

"Mr. Lewis: We are ready to hear from the operators."

p. 15, l. 34–42.

(6) "Mr. Maurer, Ohio, read the following statement:

"The answer of the operators to the proposition of the miners, in order to be thoroughly understood, makes it necessary to recall the history of wage agreements, and trace with brevity the conditions under which we have from time to time met as operators and miners and effected such agreements, so as to show connectedly the factors which have controlled both parties up to the present time.

"In the years prior to any substantial agreement the conditions of the mining industry were very unsatisfactory in their influence upon both the operators of mines and the miners in the various competitive districts. A remedy for this state of chaos was earnestly sought by both parties and resulted in the early '80's in agreements between the operators and miners of Western Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana and Illinois. In 1886 the institution of contracts between miners and operators was effected. These contracts operated with varying degrees of success and failure for some years and until about the year 1894, when these relations were dissolved. The conditions again took on an aspect of demoralization, which continued with varying degrees of intensity, numerous strikes, lockouts and consequent loss in wages and profits and sometimes injuries to property, until in the year 1898.

"During this period the conditions were such, both as to the price received for coal by operators and the price paid to the miners, that it became imperative for the interests of each to re-establish in some form the former agreements. At this time the basing price of the Hocking district was 56 cents per ton for screened lump coal. For a short time immediately preceding that year, the mining rate was 51 cents. The working hours in the districts, parties to the early agreements, were from nine and a half to ten hours per day.

"The chief evil was the fact that districts which did not recognize the United Mine Workers and had no agreements with them produced coal much more cheaply than those districts which sustained contractual relations with that organization. Some of the more important factors influencing these conditions were different methods of producing coal, varying costs of mining, different hours of labor, different sized screens, not mentioning various other elements.

"In order to correct these most harmful conditions a joint convention of operators and miners of Western Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana and Illinois, at the solicitation of the miners officials, was called to meet at Chicago in January, 1898. At this convention an interstate joint agreement was established. After a long session of deliberation and negotiation, continuing over a period of about three weeks, the basing price for mining in Ohio and Pennsylvania was increased from 56 to 66 cents per ton, an advance of practically 18 per cent, and both the existing price and method of screening and weighing of coal was made uniform throughout the entire territory covered by the terms of the contract. As a result of the Chicago convention a representative meeting was subsequently held at Columbus, at which a uniform day-wage scale was established for inside labor. All of these concessions made by the operators were of substantial benefit to the miners.

"In addition to the advance in the price of mining and the other important concessions enumerated, the action of this convention had an effect of the most far-reaching and salutary character, not alone for the mine workers but for the entire labor world, in the recognition of eight hours as constituting a day's labor, this being the first recognition of the eight-hour day by any large body of employers in the United States.

"The granting of the eight-hour day by the operators, after making these numerous other important concessions, was with the distinct understanding and explicit promise of the miners to give to the operators of the four contracting states adequate protection against the competition of the unorganized fields. From year to year they have been called upon to fulfill that promise.

"The operators, parties to that agreement, at the time of its execution felt that it was absolutely necessary to the safety of their investments that they be protected from the encroachments upon them by their competitors of the unorganized fields. The tonnage of the non-union fields entering into the competitive market, particularly of West Virginia and Kentucky, at that time was not so large, as it was aggressive and threatening, the total tonnage entering directly into competition from those fields being approximately 600,000 tons. Since, however, coal from this unorganized territory coming into direct competition with Ohio and Pennsylvania has so increased that a fair estimate places this competitive tonnage at 8,000,000 tons, which does not include the tonnage from non-union fields adjacent to the Pittsburg district. The markets in western and northern Ohio, eastern Indiana, and Michigan, from year to year have been encroached upon by coal from the unorganized districts until at the present time nearly 50 per cent of the coal consumed in these markets is supplied from fields operated with non-union labor. To find a market for the union tonnage displaced in the territory named, the mine owners of Ohio and Pennsylvania within the past five years, have made heavy investments and built and equipped large coal docks to secure the markets at the upper lake ports; but these operators now find the non-union coal rapidly commanding a heavy percentage of this market, when, at the time of the Chicago agreement the non-union fields had but a small fraction of this trade, and unless these conditions are corrected the markets so secured will soon be replaced by the tonnage from West Virginia and Kentucky.

"Though in the very heart of the consuming territory, on account of the wide difference between the price of labor in the organized fields of Ohio and Pennsylvania and the unorganized fields of West Virginia, Kentucky and the fields adjacent to the Pittsburg district, Ohio and western Pennsylvania are rapidly losing the markets at their very doors.

"It is evident to any candid observer that such unfair conditions should not be imposed upon the operators and miners of the unionized territory. That the interests of operators and miners are mutual in every respect does not admit of controversy. Each is equally concerned in rescuing this business from its present peril."

p. 16, l. 45–48.
p. 17, l. 1–50.
p. 18, l. 1–51.

(7) "Finally, we ask for the fulfillment of the pledge of 1898 upon which we made to the miners so many important and costly concessions. Though that promise has not been kept, we have continued for twelve years to make additional concessions by increasing the mining price from 66 cents agreed upon at that time to 90 cents, and in other respects conceding demands without any compensating concessions upon the part of the miners, until we now find ourselves at the limit of financial safety. The operators can make no further concessions. It is now, in our view, not only to the interest of the miners, but their duty as well, to do their share to meet these conditions.

"It has been set forth as the controlling reason for an increased price for mining that the cost of living has increased during the past few years. Is it not fair, equitable or reasonable to believe that by making conditions in all competing districts equal, the districts which are parties to this agreement will benefit by a larger number of days employment, and thus the earning capacity of the miners of our district be largely increased?

"We believe this to be a true statement of facts, and therefore call upon you to relieve us as well as yourselves from the unfortunate situation in which we now find ourselves, due to the failure of the miners' organization to keep the faith pledged at Chicago in 1898.

"We therefore insist that your organization place the districts, parties to this agreement, on the same relative basis as the unorganized districts with which we are compelled to compete."

p. 20, l. 17–42.

(8) "The Hocking District of Ohio is the basing point for this state, and if we were to accept unchallenged the statement made by our friend, Mr. Maurer, in behalf of the operators, the impression would naturally go out that the miners of this country have had their wages advanced from 56 cents a ton in 1897 to 90 cents a ton in the past two years. Let your minds go back to another period in the Hocking District, the winter of 1880, or the fall of 1879, if we must go into history. The miners of the Hocking District received for their labor as miners 60 cents a ton, 75 cents a ton, a dollar a ton, and then back to 80 cents a ton inside of two months. Market conditions caused the fluctuation, and the ability of the miners at that time to take advantage of the market conditions. That was only a temporary arrangement, but from that arrangement was established the mining rate in the Hocking District of 80 cents a ton in the winter and 70 cents a ton in the summer, and that continued year after year until 1884 when the operators of the Hocking District conceived the idea of going into a movement to reduce our wages, and after a strike of eleven months we got a beautiful trouncing at the hands of the operators. Our wages went away down, so far down that neither the miners or the operators could live or make a profit. Out of that condition, which was demoralizing to all, grew the Interstate movement of 1886. That continued, as stated by Mr. Maurer, until 1894, when the operators of the country again concluded they could do better business by running the business themselves, and we had a contest. The result was that it was settled by a compromise and everybody tried to do business the best they could until 1897. The methods of doing business 'as best they could' created another sliding scale. That scale carried with it the sliding of men's wages from one point to another until we struck not 56 cents, but 45 cents in the Hocking District, 51 cents in Eastern Ohio, and different rates all over the country. Then the operators awakened to the fact that they were going into bankruptcy, and we awakened to the fact that we were headed for the poor houses. We engaged in another contest in 1897 and as a result of that contest a compromise was effected, and this present interstate joint movement was re-established."

p. 21, l. 4–40.

(9) "I don't know whether or not all the business that transpired at Chicago was simply and purely a mutuality. I am not prepared to admit that it was. It was more a question of bargain and sale, we selling our labor at the most favorable conditions we could get you to agree with us upon, and you seeking to buy our labor at the most favorable terms you could induce us to believe you could pay for the labor you purchased."

Mr. Lewis.
p. 22, l. 17–23.

(10) "So far as establishing other conditions at Chicago is concerned, we endeavored to establish a uniform mining rate, at least in the basing points in the several competitive fields, namely, the thin vein district of Western Pennsylvania, the Hocking District of Ohio, the Bituminous District of Indiana, and the Danville District of Illinois."

Mr. Lewis.
p. 22, l. 50, 51.

(11) "One delegation of operators and miners is absent from this meeting. That is Illinois, and the operators and miners of that state are absent because they say while they are on the outside they will not come back until we agree to grant them relief, and relief is a peculiar word unless you have it interpreted. I have endeavored to get from the Illinois operators what they mean by relief, just the same as we endeavored to get from some Ohio operators last year what they meant by relief from the present situation. It sounds all right to make the statement. So far as our friends in Illinois are concerned, I said to the official representatives of the operators, 'Come into this movement, and join with us; present all the questions that you want relief from, and we will present a few to you that we want relief from in Illinois, and we will count noses to see who is right and who is wrong.' They are not here."

Mr. Lewis.
p. 23, l. 14–28.

(12) "The real facts are that the operators from Western Pennsylvania and Ohio that are going into the districts the operators complain of resort to the same tactics as the West Virginia operators do to keep the United Mine Workers out of that field."

Mr. Lewis.
p. 24, l. 1–3.

(13) "It is not a question with us of seeing how cheap we can work, and it is not a question with you of giving your coal away."

Mr. Lewis.
p. 24, l. 30–32.

(14) "If I have a proper conception of this movement it means the uplifting of the industry. If I have a proper conception of this movement, it does not mean that either operators or miners can publicly say, 'We will organize West Virginia in order that the miners of Ohio or Indiana can get more work.' That has done more to prevent the organization of West Virginia than anything I know of. Coupled with that is the attitude of Ohio and Western Pennsylvania, probably of Indiana, and I know of some Illinois operators who have gone to West Virginia and have built human fences around their properties. I mean by that that they surround their properties with pickets, men who, even when the organizers of the United Mine Workers want to walk along a county or township road passing through the properties, is met at the property line and compelled to state what his business is before he can walk on the public highway. Men will say that that is not possible in a free country, but I say it is possible. It is possible in some mining districts in this country, and I believe they are in the United States because they are in West Virginia, Kentucky, Tennessee, Alabama and a few places in Pennsylvania "

Mr. Lewis.
p. 25, l. 1–5.

(15) "It would be interesting for the American public to know how much coal from the screened coal mines is sold as mine run notwithstanding the fact that it is mined and paid for on the screened coal basis. It is hardly necessary to go into a discussion of that, because everybody who understands the mining situation knows that the steam trade of this country is a mine-run proposition. Go wherever you will in Ohio and see the engines coaled at the mines, and you will discover that where the coal is run over the screen and the nut and slack coal run through it is all put back into the bins and put on the engine tender. Of course the operators will tell us—and I do not want to make their arguments either, by the way—that they are paying the equivalent of mine-run when they are paying on a screened coal basis at the present price. We are willing to admit that it was sought to fix the equivalents on that basis, but in order that there will be no argument about the equivalent we are ready to wipe out the screened coal basis, wipe out your equivalents, and go on the run of mine basis in order that there may be no argument about that."

p. 25, l. 31–49.

(16) "There is another reason and we all recognize the force of it. If the operators of this country are not willing to get together to get living profits on their investments the mine workers of this country are not responsible, and we are not going to be parties to a condition that keeps us down to a point where we cannot meet our honest obligations and pay our debts out of the wages we receive for our labor. We want to say, and we say it kindly but positively to the gentlemen on the other side of the house, 'Get together and organize, not only in Ohio and West Virginia—and I know a lot of you have influence enough over there, if you do as much work as we do to organize them."

Mr. Lewis.
p. 26, l. 20–30.

(17) "Our third demand was for a uniform rate of wages for all classes of inside and outside labor, and time and a half for overtime, Sundays and holidays. Why do we want uniform wages for different classes of outside labor? What do we mean by uniformity? We have, generally speaking, a uniform scale for inside day labor of different classes, but for outside labor we haven't. We are unwilling to see one operator operate his mine and pay a dumper a certain rate of wages, and another operator who is his competitor in an organized district, selling his coal in the same market, pay a dumper in a mine of the same capacity a less price for his labor. What is true of the dumper is true of the engineer, the trimmer, and all the men who work on the outside of the mine."

p. 26, l. 31–43.

(18) "Our eighth proposition is 'that there shall be no limit to the amount of deductions for the organization.' We mean by that that there shall be no restriction on the amount of deduction we ask from our wages to turn over to our organization. It is true that in some of the districts there is no limitation, but in other districts there is a limitation. And while I am not one of those people who believe in organizing West Virginia to close up their mines, I am one of those people who believe in organizing West Virginia in order that the operators of the Central Competitive Field as well as West Virginia operators can get better returns on their investments, and in order that we can get better returns for our labor. If we are unable to get the operators to co-operate, to get the West Virginia operators to come into the joint movement, as was originally intended in Chicago, the only other method we have is to spend our money to organize that state and enable the operators to do business."

Mr. Lewis.
p. 27, l. 49–51.

(19) "I believe every man sitting here today will admit that this method of settling our differences has been mutually advantageous; that it has worked for the good of the industry and has provided the best way of arranging our wage contracts. As a result of it improved conditions of employment and increased wages have come to the miners, and I believe better returns on their investments have come to the gentlemen on the other side of the house. I believe it was the method by which the coal industry was put on a paying and profitable basis. I do not think any man here wishes to resort to the old method, and I do not believe there is an operator in the Central Competitive Field who has a contract with the United Mine Workers of America who would want to resort to the old method that brought about such bitter experiences and such unprofitable returns."

p. 29, l. 28–41.

(20) "Our friend, Mr. Maurer, in the well prepared statement he has submitted to this convention, referred to an obligation he claims was assumed by the United Mine Workers of America in the meeting at Chicago in 1898. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, we agreed that to a certain extent that was right; but I do not believe it was ever understood that one party to this contract was obligated exclusively to carry out that promise. I believe it was intended to be a mutual understanding and that both sides would co-operate in trying to organize West Virginia and other non-union districts in order to extend this businesslike basis of adjusting our differences to those fields.

"Let me point to the fact that the United Mine Workers of America have diligently and aggressively attempted to carry out the promise made in Chicago in 1898; that they have done everything in their power to redeem any promise they may have made to organize West Virginia. Since 1898 our organization has at various times spent hundreds of thousands of dollars trying to unionize West Virginia. We have also sacrificed human life in the attempt to redeem that promise. In view of the fact that we have spent hundreds of thousands of dollars and that our organizers, our members who have gone there as missionaries in an attempt to redeem that promise have sacrificed their lives and their liberties, we should be given credit for what we have done. I want to ask the operators how much money they have spent and what they have done to aid us to organize West Virginia.

"Is the fact that we have spent hundreds of thousands of dollars appropriated from the small earnings of our people in the Central Competitive Field, and the fact that we have sacrificed the liberty of some of our members any evidence that we have tried to redeem that promise? Does not that show that we have honestly, sincerely and diligently attempted to redeem it? I believe, gentlemen, that if the operators had done one-half as much as the miners have done, if they had even co-operated with us in what we have done, West Virginia would be organized and the operators and miners of that state would be here today participating in this joint movement."

p. 30, l. 1–31.

(21) "You on the one side have had your price of labor to consider; we have had the cost of transportation of your coal to market, where it is brought into competition with the product of other interests to consider. During this period of time your wages have remained the same; but the price of coal and the opportunity to market it from the districts of Western Pennsylvania and Ohio have been reduced. It is admitted by your president that the increase from competitive states has been much greater than the increase from other states that are recognized in this convention today."

Mr. W. P. Murray, Ohio.
p. 36, l. 1–5.

(22) "We are unwilling that the non-union operators and miners of West Virginia or of any other coal field shall set the standard of prices and the standard of living for the intelligent operators and miners engaged in the mining industry in the states that are represented here. I believe that is the honest opinion of all of the operators who are present. It is unnecessary for me to refer to the fact that many of the operators who are represented here in this joint conference have interests in West Virginia and in other non-union coal fields whose products are going into the markets they are complaining of. It is true that they have contributed, with the other operators who are engaged in the industry in those states and districts, to keep the organization from obtaining a hold or becoming a factor in the industry in those fields of which they complain. If they will withdraw their objections to the establishment of the organization in those fields, I am sure they would not be confronted with those conditions, and we would be able to remove the evil in a very brief time. The practices resorted to by the non-union operators of West Virginia are un-American."

Mr. Feehan, Pennsylvania.

(23) "If we were regulating the selling price of the product, I am sure we would not trouble the operators with our demands, but we would immediately force the consumer to pay an amount for coal that would allow those who produce it to live as respectable American working men should live."

Mr. Feehan.
p. 43, l. 10–15.

(24) "but I do propose to discuss that upon which every wage agreement must be made, and that is the best price that can be secured for the commodity you produce. A wage scale can be based on no other foundation."

Mr. Maurer, Ohio.
p. 44, l. 35–39.

(25) "To a greater or lesser extent these agreements become in the end a partnership."

Mr. Maurer, Ohio.
p. 44, l. 42–44.

(26) "We have a condition confronting this convention as grave as confronted the convention that met in Chicago in 1898. We have this great tonnage from the unorganized fields of West Virginia and Kentucky that is absolutely taking away from us our markets and taking away the employment which belongs to you. It is a condition that not one of us must meet, but that both of us must meet, not only for our protection but for your protection as well. The cost of living is only incident to it, and the mine-run basis is only incident to it. Every man who swings the pick will agree with me that we can pay you no more for mining coal than we can get for the product of your labor. And I am going to put up to you, I am willing to concede to this convention that West Virginia is not organized; that for ten or twelve long years the miners have done everything in their power to organize that field, and that they did it diligently and earnestly is admitted, nevertheless that field today is unorganized. Nobody is to blame. Neither the operator nor the miner is to blame for that condition; but it is a condition that we must meet and each one bear his share of the burden. Eight million tons of the coal from that unorganized state is today taking away from you the product of your labor, and taking away from the operator every cent of profit he ever had in the business. You cannot correct that. You may say to us, 'You must get together and agree upon prices; you must get the West Virginia operators in and agree upon a price.' Why, every man who stands here knows that if the operators in the State of Ohio attempt it they do so in violation of the Valentine law and that the penitentiary stares them in the face. Every miner here knows that if in the States of Ohio and West Virginia the operators were to attempt anything of the kind, they would violate, not only the Valentine law of Ohio, but they would violate the Sherman Anti-trust Law. It is easy to tell us what to do, but you should also tell us how to do it. Does any miner here believe that the operators of the State of Ohio have not tried to get the best price they can for their commodity? We have some interest in our business, we have our money invested in it, and I assure you that for two years the miners and the railroads have got every cent there was in it, and more too."

(27) "However, we stayed in the market, we gave you employment. Now, it is up to the miners of this state to meet those conditions and bear their share of that burden. I want to tell you here that if the miners of the State of Ohio insist on an increased price of their coal they will lose every bit of business they have on the Great Lakes. You have already lost your commercial business. Who supplies Michigan today with commercial coal? Who supplies Detroit? Who supplies Toledo? Who supplies Marion? Who supplies Columbus, right in the heart of the Hocking District? Who supplies Eastern Indiana? Who supplies all of Western Ohio? Tell me, tell me you miners from the Hocking Valley who have seen your mines lay idle while West Virginia coal in train load lots has gone past your mines! Tell me you miners in Eastern Ohio who have stood idly by and watched Fairmont coal in train load lots taking your markets! Ninety per cent of that market is supplied by West Virginia coal from the non-union fields. I say to you the cost of living does not enter into this. I say to you these other elements did not enter into this. I say to you that the best price we can get for our coal under the competitive conditions will not admit of it.

"You miners who mine coal in the State of Ohio, and, if you please, in Western Pennsylvania, know that every bit of the trade I refer to was formerly supplied by Ohio and Pennsylvania even down to the gas business, but it is now supplied by West Virginia."

Mr. Maurer, Ohio.
p. 46, l. 16–40.

(28) "If it is a partnership, deal with it as a partnership."

Mr. Maurer, Ohio.
p. 46, l. 46, 47.

(29) "We both have a condition confronting us, and as long as West Virginia is in the field with her increased production and her low cost of mining you have got to put us on a competitive basis or you have got to lose your business."

Mr. Maurer, Ohio.
p. 47, l. 3–7.

(30) "I appeal to you in all fairness, I appeal to you as fair-minded men engaged in a common purpose, and that purpose is to find a market for your commodity, to bear a share of this burden."

Mr. Maurer, Ohio.
p. 47, l. 13–16.

(31) "Now the argument is made that we ought to turn our attention to West Virginia and stop the competition from that state. I admit that argument is good; but in order for that argument to have strength it is necessary for the operators at home to stop the kind of guerilla warfare they have among themselves."

Mr. Lewis.
p. 48, l. 18–23.

(32) "Mr. Maurer has very well said—and I am glad he has brought the subject up—that we say to the operators, 'Get a better price for your coal in order that you can pay us a better price for our labor.' Then he supplements that statement, and very properly, by the statement that if they were to organize to get a better price for their coal they would be haled into court under the provisions of the Valentine law of Ohio and possibly sent to the penitentiary. Probably we would too. He supplements that statement by asking us to tell them how to get a better price for their coal. I am going to tell you. First, stop making war on the railroads. The poor fellows need help! And this proposition is going to be no joke. I recognize what the mining industry is; I recognize that it is more important than transportation. I recognize that the Valentine law of the State of Ohio was put on the statute books by a lot of political demagogues who believed they were working in the interests of the dear people—and they did it once for the dear people and about twenty times for themselves! I recognize that this industry does not occupy the plane among the industries of the country that it ought to occupy, because we have met in joint conventions year after year and discussed our wage relations instead of devoting some of our time to going out and telling certain people to keep their hands off our business.

"The railroad companies of this country say to the mine owners, 'We want our fuel at a certain rate.' The mine owners, in order to get a part of the fuel trade of the railroads, put down the prices in some instances to cost, not because of competition, but because of your desire to get a part of that trade. Then after securing a part of that trade the official representatives of the railroads are in so close touch with the leaders of the manufacturing industries of our country that the steam trade, as we call it, buys fuel almost at as cheap a price as the railroad company. Then in order to make ends meet somebody must pay a better price, and it is usually the domestic consumers, the masses of the people. And that is where the political demagogues get their work in, because they are the people who have votes and that is why they have anti-conspiracy laws placed on the statute books.

"That is not the only phase of it that hurts us. In order to crowd out somebody or in order to get a better price for coal going into the markets our friends on the other side, finding that the miners' contract is signed on this end, that the railroads are insisting on a lower price on the other side, seek to get a readjustment of the freight rates in order that they may increase their returns on their investment. What is the result? They haul the railroads before the railroad commission or before the Interstate Commerce Commission and secure a readjustment of freight rates as was done in Ohio recently when the rate was made 20 cents a ton lower than it was last year. Of course that makes a railroad feel good! The railroads, like the rest of us have more or less resistance in their makeup against what they call unreasonable demands. They go into the courts, and the operators will very probably say that while they have a decision from the Ohio Railroad Commission the chances are it will not become operative for a year or two because the railroads will fight it in the courts, the operators will do the same, and they will all spend money in legal fees that should go to paying our wages and go to giving you returns on your investment. It is true that that is what is transpiring, because you men deluded yourselves into the belief that the railroads are going to hold a dividing line along the Ohio River. Don't you think they will readjust the rates going over to West Virginia? Certainly. There is a well-founded suspicion in the minds of most men that the railroads have an indirect interest in the mines, not only in West Virginia, but in a great many other coal producing states. The railroads in Illinois have advanced freight rates 10 cents a ton on all of the coal to be handled there the coming year. The Illinois operators will probably meet us in conference, and they will say, 'We must get relief because the railroads have put on an increased rate of 10 cents, and you must meet the issue.' Of course we must meet the issue, no matter what we get. We are going to meet it. We are going to insist upon an advance in wages. We are going any length to enable you to get a better price for coal than you have been receiving; but we do not want so much competition in your own ranks. You should not come in here until you come, as they say in court, with clean hands on your own proposition."

p. 48, l. 38–51.
p. 49, l. 1–51.
p. 50, l. 1–11.

(33) "I am ready to admit with him that any system that sells to the big consumer, who can afford to pay a big price, a commodity at cost, or less than cost, and then in order to make up the deficiency taxes the little fellow who cannot afford to pay a price larger than it would be necessary under ordinary circumstances, is wrong."

p. 50, l. 42–48.

(34) "The very purpose of the union is to increase the price of labor, to reduce the hours of labor, and then when that is done in this meeting we go home and there are attempts made, and often enforced, that further increase the cost. That is the very purpose of unionism. It has no right to life on any other plane than that, or least we have never discovered it. It has no object in existing that we know anything about except to increase wages and decrease hours of work, and it has been successful in doing it. It is also a fact that not more than one-half of the miners of the United States are unionized. Those who are not unionized work more hours, perform more labor for less money, and as a result throw on the market a cheap product. Those are the non-union men, those are the men who are our mutual foes. They are your foe, and as long as you pursue a policy of trying to get more from the operators in the territory that is unionized, getting more directly and getting more by indirect methods, you are furnishing an inducement to the non-union miner and to the non-union coal operator to remain in that position, because they are better able to take your trade, they are better able to take our markets, they are better able to get your work, and the operators are better able to get our profits."

Mr. Penna.
p. 51, l. 6–26.

(35) "It is time for you to step up with us and say to those men in West Virginia, 'You will either decrease your hours of labor and increase your wages to meet these conditions or we will meet them.'"

Mr. Zerbe.
p. 60, l. 20–23.

(36) "There are three things that are the cause of present conditions—too high cost of production, discriminating freight rates, and the low prices caused by competition with non-union fields."

Mr. Chapman, Ohio.
p. 61, l. 18–20.

(37) "It is an admitted fact that there is a difference today of between 40 and 50 cents per ton in the cost of production of coal in the union fields of Ohio and the non-union fields of the trade east and south of us in West Virginia, Kentucky, Tennessee and Alabama, and three of those states, gentlemen, are competitors in the markets of Ohio Coal—West Virginia, Kentucky and Tennessee."

Mr. Chapman, Ohio.
p. 61, l. 41–47.

(38) "The production of West Virginia for 1907 was 40,043,311 gross tons, 44,091,000 being net tons. In 1908 the production was 44,091,000 net tons. In 1909 the production was 44,495,000 net tons."

Mr. Chapman.

(39) "Ohio's production for 1907 was 32,365,949 net tons; in 1908, 26,287,800 net tons, and in 1909, 27,756,172 net tons."

Mr. Chapman.
p. 62, l. 33, 34.

(40) "There are some more interesting statistics connected with this proposition. The following are the numbers of days the miners worked in West Virginia during the years from 1904 to 1909: 1904, 209; 1905, 213; 1906, 237; 1907, 234; 1908, 211; 1909, 192; making an average of 216 days of ten hours per day, or a total of 2,160 hours worked each year. Reduced to eight hours per day would be an average of 270 days each year. Ohio worked in 1904, 164 days; 1905, 171; 1906, 175; 1907, 204; 1908, 157; 1909, 165 days, an average for the six years of 173 days, or ninety-seven days less than the average work in West Virginia on the eight-hour basis."

Mr. Chapman.
p. 63, l. 1–3.

(41) "Now gentlemen, it is useless, after the discussions that have taken place here by the gentlemen who preceded me, to discuss at any great length the market that the non-union fields have taken from Ohio in the past. It has been well said that they are putting coal into Columbus, into Michigan, into Detroit, taking the markets that heretofore have been enjoyed by Ohio coal. In the city of Athens, Ohio, which is within three miles of several of the large producing Hocking Valley mines, West Virginia coal is being sold. The gentlemen who are familiar with the situation have informed me that over 2,000 tons of West Virginia coal was sold there between the first of September and a short time ago. Even in the town of Logan, one of the points where Hocking Valley gathers its trains to start its coal out to the markets they have, West Virginia coal is taking that market. The gentlemen who were in the Toledo convention and returned on the Hocking Valley train, if they had their eyes open, would have seen full solid trains of Norfolk and Western coal passing up over that road to Toledo. There was not a single car of Hocking Valley coal in the trains. At the town of Bowling Green, twenty miles south of Toledo; when I came through a few weeks ago, I saw every car of coal standing on the side tracks were loaded with West Virginia coal.

"Think of the proposition, gentlemen! Toledo, the central point at which several Ohio coal roads bring everything, and 60 per cent or more of the coal being consumed there is from West Virginia! The Pennsylvania people have a road coming in there, the Wheeling and Lake Erie have a road coming in there, the Toledo and Ohio Central goes in there, the Hocking Valley goes in there, and the D. T. & I. goes in there on a direct line. Now just consider that proposition for a minute, and is it any wonder that Ohio coal operators and interests are in the condition they are today with that state of affairs?

"It was well said by Mr. Lewis and Mr. Penna that people buy their fuel where they can buy it cheapest. I am not through with this proposition. I want to bring you to the city we are now holding this convention in and give you a few figures. In 1897 Pittsburg shipped by river, 1,401,000 tons of coal to the city of Cincinnati. The Kanawha region shipped by river 717,000 tons of coal. The Kanawha fields shipped by rail 704,000 tons. The other interests from West Virginia, Kentucky and Tennessee shipped here 275,400 tons. Now we will come to the year 1908.

"Pittsburg District shipped 535,000 tons to the city of Cincinnati in 1908 as against 10,401,000 in 1897. Kanawha shipped by river 867,000 tons in 1908, as against 717,000 tons in 1897, and Kanawha shipped by rail in 1908, 1,848,000 tons, as against 462,000 in 1897. The Pocahontas District, the Tennessee and Alabama fields shipped in 1908 by rail 1,512,000 tons to the city of Cincinnati as against 275,400 in 1907.

"Gentlemen, do you need any more statistics of this kind to show where the coal trade of Ohio and Pennsylsylvania is going? I do not want to worry you, but I have some more statistics that are interesting.

"Mr. Lewis: Go ahead.

"Mr. Chapman: I will now present the lake tonnage figures:

West Virginia—1901, 739,011 tons, 12.73 per cent;
1907, 3,249,505 tons, 19.02 per cent;
1908, 3,521,149 tons, 23.98 per cent;
1909, 3,793,517 tons, 25.61 per cent.

"Poor Hocking Valley, gentlemen, makes a bad showing.

"The following are the figures for Hocking Valley:

1901, 1,513,646 tons, 26.08 per cent;
1907, 2,125,692 tons, 12.64 per cent;
1908, 1,378,465 tons, 9.41 per cent;
1909, 1,199,670 tons, 8.10 per cent.

"The following are the figures for all Ohio:

1901, 1,824,507 tons, 21.37 per cent;
1907, 4,186,571 tons, 24.89 per cent.
1908, 3,484,845 tons, 23.81 per cent;
1909, 3,111,256 tons, 21.02 per cent.

"That shows what is becoming of Ohio's lake trade that we have heretofore enjoyed. These figures speak for themselves as to Ohio's condition."

p. 63, l. 20–51.
p. 64, l. 1–40.

(42) "Now I am going to say something that isn't very pleasant, but I will make the statement all the same. I have been told that some of the best lawyers in the country claim that your organization is liable under the same laws, if prosecuted, for combination in restraint of trade and that your check-off, although agreed to locally, is absolutely in violation of the law. These lawyers said they would be willing to take a case with their fees contingent upon their success in winning it."

Mr. Chapman.
p. 65, l. 3–10.

(43) "You made promises in 1898 that you have not kept. You may have tried to keep those promises, but you know what was said and what was done on the floor of the convention in 1898. I was a participant in it, as I have been in the preceding interstate movements. You know what the understanding was, and you know that at every session of every convention that has been held from that time down to the present we have asked you to carry out and make good what you said you would do at that first conference. In my opinion the only way you can ever hope to succeed in putting the union fields on a competitive basis in cost with the non-union fields, the only way you can give your people more work and the other fellows less is to reduce your wages to enable the operators to produce their coal at a cost that will enable them to take the trade. It can be done in no other way. You have tried the other process for twelve years and it has been a total failure; you are weaker now in the non-union fields than you ever were."

Mr. Chapman.
p. 66, l. 1–9.

(44) "It has been intimated by some of the gentlemen to me—and I took Mr. Lewis' remarks to indicate when he was speaking on the subject of railroad freight reductions to mean this—that should the operators of Ohio succeed in getting discriminating freight rates removed to some extent you would feel you were entitled to part of it."

Mr. Chapman.
p. 66, l. 17–22.

(45) "In 1907 and 1908 the miners earned more money in West Virginia at the prices they were paid there than were earned by Ohio. In fact they earned from one hundred to one hundred and fifty dollars more to the man. That tells the tale concerning that matter."

p. 66, l. 27–31.

(46) "'The controlling influence in Ohio has been the competition of West Virginia coals with the domestic product, unhampered by the restrictions that hamper states in which the miners are thoroughly organized, such as Ohio, and also because of the conditions of mining. The coals of West Virginia are said to be mined at about one-half the cost of producing Ohio coals and the West Virginia product has taken the Ohio markets to the full extent permitted by the difference in transportation expenses, leaving Ohio coals only such markets as may be near the mines, and as the means of transportation increases by which West Virginia coals are put farther into Ohio markets, the prospect of the Ohio mines is not bright.'"

Mr. Chapman.
p. 66, l. 40–51.

(47) "It is not surprising that West Virginia is on a mine-run basis. Why? Because a large per cent of all the fine coal that is produced in that State is made into coke. They even crush the lump coal after they produce it to make coke, which is much more valuable product to them and yields them more returns than the raw coal will. We haven't any of those coals in Ohio or Indiana and they have none of them in Western Pennsylvania outside of the coking coal as it is known there."

Mr. Chapman.
p. 68, l. 2–10.

(48) "The demands you make will mean the disruption of the joint movement."

p. 68, l. 17, 18.

(49) "West Virginia seems to be the stumbling block, the great obstacle in the way of bringing about an adjustment in the wage scale. Yesterday evening I met President Davis of the West Virginia miners' organization in the hotel lobby and asked him how many miners were here. He said there were quite a number of miners' representatives, and I told him I was going to make a proposition today to the operators, in view of the fact that West Virginia has been the subject of discussion here, that the operators and miners had both received a severe scoring, that President Davis and his miners be admitted. We have enough from the other side, from the Pittsburg District and Ohio who have interests in West Virginia to represent that State also for the operators. Let President Davis and his delegates who are here be admitted, become a part of the joint conference, make a scale for them, and then let the operators and miners jointly pledge themselves to go out after the agreement has been consummated and enforce its provisions on the operators who have not come here to be represented. I think in all fairness to both the operators and the mine workers that should be done. They should be given representation or they should not be the subjects of such severe criticism."

Mr. Feehan.
p. 78, l. 7–27.

(50) "I said yesterday that the mine workers of Western Pennsylvania, Ohio and Indiana who were represented here, were not going to permit either the miners or the operators of West Virginia to set a scale of wages for them or a standard of living. We are unwilling to accept their prices or conditions, although I have reason to believe there is not so much material difference as some of you would try to make it appear. I am unwilling, however, that they should be referred to, or that their conditions of labor or prices should govern the working conditions or the prices of the mine workers of the districts here represented.

"There is one point I want to bring out that has not been made clear, and that is the disadvantage the operators of Eastern Ohio are put to in competing for the markets against the operators who have interests in West Virginia, and that is the character of the veins. In West Virginia it is not an uncommon thing to have them develop from six to ten feet of clean coal. There is no slate to remove; it is easily mined; it is a good grade of coal; it can find a market; and when you take into consideration the cost of producing a ton of that coal compared with the little five-foot vein of coal in Eastern Ohio with its many impurities and its thick slate, and the Pittsburg District, with its weak roof, where in many cases it is difficult to operate a machine, as well as many other natural disadvantages the operators have, herein lies the cause of the competition more than in the cost of labor. The cost of labor is not the important factor that is crowding the Eastern Ohio operators out of the market on the lakes or elsewhere. It is the natural disadvantages that is doing it. There is one advantage the operators in Eastern Ohio have, and that is their geographical situation. They are nearer the lake markets and other markets, and I believe they have an advantage of from 15 to 25 cents a ton in freight rates. I understand that when the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission goes into effect they will have even greater advantages in freight rates. It is fortunate for them that they have these advantages. Were it not for their advantages in the matter of freight rates I am positive that many of the veins of coal now being worked in Ohio and elsewhere would be abandoned, and they would wait until the big veins with the greater natural advantages in West Virginia were worked out before they would again operate there. These factors have not been seriously enough considered heretofore."

Mr. Feehan.
p. 78, l. 28–51.
p. 79, l. 1–17.

(51) "A demand has been made for the run-of-mine system. I am not expressing the opinion of the Pittsburg operators now, I am speaking as an individual. If I had the power of the Czar of Russia and could enforce what I wished, I would have all the coal in the United States mined on the run-of-mine basis, provided the miners would be a little less human, provided they would be fair and give us the same grade of coal they are now giving us when on a screened coal basis. That would do away with the trouble. But our experience in years gone by and our experience now is quite the reverse of that. In 1898 we found where we were on run-of-mine our coal was simply shattered and shot to pieces. The increase in fine coal that is going through the screen after run-of-mine is a very large per cent. You know as well as I do that nobody will do work that he does not have to. We are all after short cuts, and after the easy way. The miner is not going to shoot his coal so carefully when he is paid for everything he brings down and loads out, as when he is on a screened coal basis and he knows he will be paid on what comes to him after screening. The kind of coal we want in the Pittsburg District, by reason of trade conditions, is clean, good, large lump coal, and that we must have to retain our trade.

Mr. Schleuderberg.
p. 84, l. 29–49.

(52) "If there are any men going from Western Pennsylvania to West Virginia is it not because they want to get where some of them at least feel they will be free men, where they will not be subject to the authority of the organization, and subject to the payments that some of them are required to make? Is not that perhaps just as good a reason as any that have been advanced?"

Mr. Schleuderberg.
p. 86, l. 1–3.

(53) "Every mining locality has certain local markets that are designated as particularly their own. I presume that is true of every district represented in this joint conference. Western Pennsylvania, Ohio and Indiana have markets that are designated as their own. That is proper and right. These markets are contiguous to the railroads traversing their property, and by reason of natural conditions, favorable location, freight rates and other things that are advantageous to them, these markets can be claimed as their own. I think any man must admit that so far as West Virginia is concerned her markets within her borders are very limited compared with the great production of coal in that district. It is an admitted fact that West Virginia must seek a market for practically the entire product outside the borders of that State. Ohio, by reason of her peculiar location perhaps suffers to a greater extent than the other districts. The great markets of the Northwest are sought by both the West Virginia producers of coal and by the producers of coal in Ohio. There is keen competition for those markets, and practically 90 per cent of the tonnage that seeks a market in the Northwest from West Virginia traverses the State of Ohio."

Mr. Green, Ohio.
p. 88, l. 25–44.

(54) "The railway systems of this country are the great consumers of coal, and it is a notorious fact that, notwithstanding they are better able to pay for the fuel they use than are the men who consume the coal that goes to what is ordinarily known as the domestic trade, these great railway corporations get their fuel cheaper than anybody else who buys coal. There is where a lot of trouble on this proposition is, and I repeat what has been said by my colleagues in support of my proposition, that one way by which you can pay us this advance in wages is to compel these great corporations that are getting their coal at ridiculously low prices to pay more for it. That will prevent you from longer giving away your product to those who are able to pay for it."

Mr. Green, Ohio.
p. 90, l. 27–39.

(55) "There is too much of a tendency existing in the minds of the men connected with the mining industry to see how much coal they can pick out of the hills and convert, as they believe, into value in the form of property or money, and in their anxiety to do it they go to work and take contracts at prices that they should not even consider. As a result some one has to suffer. When some of the operators suffer I do not blame them at all for their efforts to try to convince us we ought to bear the burdens and responsibility and share in the mistakes they have made. If they can convince us we ought to do that, I haven't a single word of complaint to make; but there will have to be more than mere statements made to convince me that that is the correct way of bargaining in selling and buying labor in these joint conventions."

Mr. Lewis.
p. 102, l. 15–28.

(56) "I agree with Mr. Green that the great State of West Virginia is reaching out in every direction. The gentleman that preceded him on the floor from the miners' side stated that, as far as Eastern Ohio was concerned, we had such a coal that we could not hope to market it, or something to that effect. If we cannot market our coal, what becomes of the 15,000 miners in our employ? That does not apply only to Eastern Ohio coal, but to every ton of coal that is produced in the State of Ohio. Our domestic coal is being supplanted by West Virginia coal. You know what district formerly supplied the great Northwest with its dock coal for domestic consumption—the Hocking district of the State of Ohio. Where is the great supply of domestic coal for the great Northwest coming from today? From the splint coal fields of West Virginia. It is not the cheap coal you refer to, but it is the domestic coal, it is every coal in the State of Ohio that has been supplanted by the product of non-union labor from West Virginia."

p. 104, l. 6–22.

(57) "And I want to say to you that it is not the railroad corporations of the State of Ohio or any other State that pay the lowest price for coal. The lowest-priced coal that was sold in the State of Ohio was the coal that went on the docks to the great Northwest to hold the market in competition with West Virginia coals. When West Virginia named the price, $1.75 f. o. b. docks, Lake Erie ports, either Ohio had to meet it or go out of business in the Northwest. The operators of Ohio met the price and went into the markets and have protected them up to this time. If this is a partnership agreement that condition must be met, and for that reason I say the cost of living is but an incident. The cost of materials for the mines has increased, the cost of iron and lumber and locomotives and machinery has increased; but the price of coal has not increased and it has not increased because of the ruinous competition from West Virginia and Kentucky."

Mr. Maurer, Ohio.
p. 104, l. 30–45.

(58) "Now the question is this: Do the miners, 60,000 of them in the State of Ohio, who are in partnership with the mine owners of this State, expect to maintain their market or not? I want to say to you in all fairness that if the price of coal in Ohio is increased 10 cents or 5 cents per ton, two years from today the West Virginia competition in Ohio will not be 8,000,000 tons but 15,000,000. Now let's get down to the meat of the cocoanut, and what is it? Is it the cost of living? It is the best price we can get for the commodity we have to sell. It is your commodity and it is our commodity. It is your bread and butter and it is our bread and butter. It does not belong to West Virginia; it is ours. Are you going to stand with us and protect it?"

Mr. Maurer, Ohio.
p. 105, l. 1–6.

(59) "Keep one thing in mind—keep the facts staring you in the face that for two years your mines have laid idle while West Virginia non-union tonnage took the markets that belonged to you and to us. We stand next to these markets. In order to maintain our markets we on this side invested our money in the great Northwest and built docks to keep the market for you. That market today is in jeopardy on account of the competition from West Virginia."

Mr. Maurer, Ohio.

(60) "I called attention the other day to the fact of what we believed the railroads of this country ought to do. What was that? That they ought to pay a higher price for fuel. That is not the first time I have talked about that. We have talked higher price fuel to the railroads in public more than all the operators in the United States put together. I don't know what they have talked behind the scenes. I made the statement also, as far as my memory serves me, that the Ohio operators had gone before the Ohio Railroad Commission and had secured a decision reducing freight rates 20 cents a ton from Eastern Ohio to lake points. I pointed out where, in my opinion, the transportation industry and the mining industry ought to be closer together than they are. I pointed out where, in my judgment, the operators should say to the railroad men, instead of having each other hauled into the courts, before railroad commissions and the Interstate Commerce Commission, fighting each other and paying large legal fees, they should get together and the mining industry ought to impress upon the minds of the railroad interests the necessity of paying a higher price for fuel. That is in substance what I said. And if the other interpretation was placed upon it, I am sorry for it, but it does not change my opinion in regard to the matter.

"Now let me tell you something else. In the face of the fact that Ohio has secured a reduction in the freight rates for lake points as against this non-union competition, in the face of the fact that they have secured a reduction of 20 cents a ton, I would not even take advantage of that and say you ought to give us half of that. I said you would probably have to fight that in the courts for a year. I pointed out all of those things in my discussion so there would be no element of unfairness in what I said. This is the first time in a joint conference, so far as I know, where the operators have undertaken to say I have resorted to unfair methods of discussion. I am sorry that has been said here. That is not my way of negotiating contracts. I tell our people when they are wrong just as quick as I do you."

Mr. Lewis.
p. 109, l. 38–44.
p. 110, l. 1–28.

(61) "So far as the railroad interests are concerned, and so far as I am concerned, if I had my way—and perhaps it is a good thing for the railroads I have not—they would not be able to buy a ton of coal anywhere in the United States for less than $1.25."

Mr. Lewis.

(62) "Mr. Savage, Ohio: I was surprised a minute ago to hear that some of the operators were not in sympathy with the men in trying to get a readjustment of their freight rates in Ohio. I know as one miner we did all we possibly could in giving testimony before the commission in Columbus, and from what I heard then I believed, and I believe now, that the operators were absolutely right in asking for this readjustment. I believe I can assure you that we will help you in every manner that we can to get that readjustment. But we would ask you, on the other hand, if we are willing to help you—and by helping you we agree we are helping ourselves—if you operators from Ohio and Pennsylvania will lend us the same assistance in West Virginia in getting the mining price up so that competition will not prevail. When we ask that what do we find? Operators have told me in years past that they were willing to have the miners organize in Ohio, but they were not willing that their miners should be organized in West Virginia. We find as great opposition on the part of the operators from this State who have mines in West Virginia as we find from the operators resident there. If we are going to work along the line of mutual benefit, let us make West Virginia a union State. Go down there and practice what you preach in Ohio. Help us get the protection of the law in that State and I think we can organize the miners. Instead of helping us, what have you done? You have done nothing but retard the progress of our organization in that State. The reason they have assigned to me for their attitude was that the calibre of the men employed in the mines of West Virginia was such that if they were organized it would be impossible to control them. I believe that a large percentage of those men are as intelligent as we are, and once they understand the benefits of the organization and the benefits of the contract we enter into, they will observe those contracts as religiously as the miners in Ohio, Pennsylvania, Indiana or any other State."

(63) "You men are in a position to get for the product of the mines a fair profit. You are the men who make the prices, and if you do not make the prices it is not the fault of the miners. If the miners had the power to make prices on your product, I assure you Eastern Ohio would not be selling 85-cent coal. As long as you continue to do as you are, you are the people who are responsible. If you want any assistance from the miners to raise the price of coal, we are at your command any time, but we are not going to raise it by taking a reduction in wages or working for the wages we are now getting. That is our position, and I believe you men understand it. As Mr. Lewis has stated to you, we know that selling coal at 85 cents a ton is not a very profitable business, and as long as you continue to do it you are going to be the losers. It is in your hands to remedy this condition and I hope you will do it or turn over the selling of your coal to the miners. If you do that the railroads of this country will not get 85-cent coal."

(64) "We believe in doing all we can to rectify the wrongs that now exist between the different coal competing states. We believe in the operators in Virginia bringing up the standard of the miners there. If the operators would put their shoulders to the wheel and do what they could to make it possible for us to go over there and talk to them we might be able to do something with them. You may say, 'Oh, you may say we can do that now.' Are you not all members of the great political parties which control the politics of West Virginia? How many of you have appealed through the press of the country against the outrageous assaults and murders of our men? I have never seen a protest coming from you men in regard to the conduct of the operators in West Virginia when they hire men to kill our people, and where the law makers and the law executors of that State sit by and say nothing of the assaults and murders. If you men did half as much as we have done toward organizing West Virginia and making conditions better, I believe there would be a change in the coal industry of this country. But we are not going to compete the way your proposition presents itself; we are not going to compete along those lines until first you have wiped out every vestige of organization there is in this country, and then we are not going to do it. If it were done, from the ashes of the organization you destroyed, would arise another organization more compact and powerful that would resist any such thing as that. The law of evolution is working along social and industrial lines, and we must place ourselves in position to accept the inevitable. The miners, like all the working men of this country, through the medium of machinery increasing the productiveness of the working people, have reached the point where we produce more than the world consumes."

Mr. McCullough.
p. 119, l. 1–27.

(65) "A very considerable amount of censure and criticism has been put upon some operators who are here because of the fact that they have gone to West Virginia and found investments. I will remind the other side of the house that the men who have gone into Virginia are business men; they are engaged in the coal industry, and they bring the commodity from one State to another to furnish fuel for such contracts as they take. They have found by experience that you as an organized body are not treating them fairly where they are circumscribed in the production of this commodity. They find that you are putting upon them burdens in the organized fields that do not exist in the unorganized fields. By reason of the fact that you cannot control in the production of this commodity, although we are willing to admit you have made an effort, their market is being taken from them or restricted or narrowed, and many of them in self-defense find it necessary, in order to carry out contracts and fulfill their obligations to those who take this commodity from them, to go to West Virginia and invest in properties there that they may continue a business for which they are obligated."

Mr. Zerbe, Ohio.
p. 122, l. 21–40.

(66) "We might argue this up one side and down another for a year and we would be no nearer a solution of this proposition. We are, when we get through, right up against the one proposition we cannot get through which has been created by the competition brought to bear against us by the operators and the miners of West Virginia in the unorganized field."

Mr. Zerbe, Ohio.
p. 123, l. 46–51.

(67) "Chairman Kolsem: The question now is on the adoption of the motion to accept the proposition of the miners. If you are ready to vote the Secretary will call the roll.

"Secretary Brooks called the roll of States. The operators of Western Pennsylvania, Ohio and Indiana, voted in the negative; the miners of Western Pennsylvania, Ohio and Indiana, voted in the affirmative.

"Chairman Kolsem declared the motion lost for want of a unanimous affirmative vote.

"Mr. Lewis: I move that the entire proposition be referred to the Joint Scale Committee.

"The motion was seconded by Mr. Schluederberg and carried by unanimous viva voce vote."

p. 125, l. 18–30.

(68) "Mr. Lewis: In order to settle one matter I would like to know whether this is to be an open session. One or two newspaper representatives have asked me. I am not sure whether our Scale Committee meetings have been open or not.

"Mr. Zerbe: I move that the Scale Committee meet in executive session. (Seconded and carried.)"

p. 127, l. 6–11.

(69) Mr. Penna, Indiana: "I am going before this meeting is through, in very many instances, to accuse the miners of a lack of integrity, of absolute dishonesty, and having made the accusation I am going to prove it, and anybody that does not like it will have to dislike it; and if I am guilty, either through misunderstanding or wilfully so, I expect the miners to put it to me just as raw as I put it to them.

"Mr. Lewis: I expect we will."

p. 134, l. 42–49.

(70) "I don't believe in that. We must make up our minds that we are all friends and that we are working together against the common enemy."

Mr. Jones, Pennsylvania.

p. 135, l. 25–27.

(71) "Let us make up our minds that our interests are mutual and are not two sided. We have got to agree here upon a price at which we can market our goods as against the other fellow. Let us feel that we are one in negotiating this wage agreement."

Mr. Jones, Pennsylvania.

(72) "Mr. Chapman, Ohio: Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen: I have only a few words to say this morning on this mine-run proposition that has been discussed in all the conventions we have held for many years. The reasons why we oppose it have been given. I desire to state, as I did on the floor of the convention that when an investigation was held in the State of Illinois by the operators there they reported that by reason of going on the mine-run basis, their coal had deteriorated in value from 14 to 21 cents per ton. The purpose and object should be to get out of the coal that is produced the kind that will yield the most revenue in the selling of it to the purchaser. There are districts—as the gentleman who has preceded me knows, many of them in the State of Ohio, where it would be an impossibility upon any basis of mine-run to produce that coal for the markets it has to reach. And I say as one of the representatives of the Ohio operators that under no circumstances will they consider a proposition of mine-run coal for the product of Ohio."

p. 137, l. 16–32.

(73) "Prior to 1898 Indiana was based on the Hocking Valley price, and it was assumed, whether it was true or not, that we received the equivalent of the Hocking Valley screened coal price as a mine-run price. When we came into the Chicago convention a flat rate of 49 cents for mine-run coal was made for the Indiana district. The fact was brought out that the price made for mine-run was a better proposition to the operators than the Hocking Valley price, and it was so thoroughly believed by the operators of Indiana that they persistently insisted on remaining on a flat mine-run basis. I mean by this, regardless of whether they made screened coal or mine-run coal, they paid the miners of Indiana on a flat mine-run scale, when they could have had for their screened coal the Hocking Valley price.

"Now this condition remained in Indiana for a period of two years, over the protest of the miners, and was changed in 1900 in the city of Indianapolis by the adoption of a double standard, putting a clause in the contract that provided that where coal was shipped as mine-run it should be paid for on the mine-run basis, and where it was shipped screened coal it should be paid for on the screened coal basis. Since that time the miners of Indiana have been paid on a double standard. It is a fact in a majority of the mines in Indiana today that the miners do not know whether they are going to run screened coal one hour, two hours, all day, or half a day, or whether they are going to run mine-run. That is the situation in Indiana."

p. 141, l. 14–39.

(74) "The fact is that the Indiana coal operators as an association have always stood, and are standing today, flat-footed in opposition to the mine-run system. The last time that the matter was discussed our association determined to avoid it carefully and get as far from it as we could. In Indianapolis, the time the gentleman refers to, we simply bought the settlement. Indiana had to pay the price, as she usually has had to do in those interstate meetings."

Mr. Penna, Indiana.

(75) "Regardless of the argument presented against the mine-run system, if we were in a position to definitely state—and I admit I am not—the amount of coal that is sold mine-run and paid for on a screened-coal basis, I believe it would be astonishing to everybody here—astonishing from the large amount of coal that is sold run-of-mine and paid for on a screened-coal basis. In many places the coal is screened, weighed and run back together again. I have no knowledge of just how much coal is sold in that way."

Mr. Lewis.
p. 160, l. 9–17.

(76) "But I do desire, for the sake of correcting the records, to challenge the statement made by my friend on the other side of the house that the Indiana miners paid for the Chicago agreement. I deny, gentlemen, that the Indiana miners, or the Ohio miners, or the miners of Pennsylvania, or any other miners involved in the Chicago agreement paid for the settlement reached at that convention."

Mr. Ratchford, Ohio.
p. 166, l. 24–30.

(77) "Mr. Ratchford, Ohio: I have stated, Mr. Chairman, that I challenge the statement made this morning by a gentleman on the other side of the house that Indiana miners paid for the Chicago agreement. That is specific, I think. The statements made on the floor of the joint convention in connection with the Chicago agreement, and its relation to certain districts or parts of districts covered by this agreement, were made by Mr. Lewis. That I will discuss, and shall be glad to discuss with Mr. Lewis at any time, but I do not believe this is the proper place to discuss it. To be specific, Mr. Lewis stated, as I believe the records will show, that the Chicago convention was a matter of sale and barter and that the eight-hour work day secured at that time did not mean a material reduction in the hours of labor to certain miners in Ohio. That is what I referred to."

p. 166, l. 41–47.

(78) "There were premiums paid by the operators and miners in Chicago to get an agreement. I do not care what other name you give it, that is the proper name. In Chicago the miners of Illinois got an advance of 3 cents in the mining rate on the mine-run basis, while in the other districts on screened coal they got 10 cents a ton, so far as Indiana and Ohio were concerned. In the Pittsburg District they wiped out an inch and a half screen—and what else? They accepted an inch and a quarter screen, accepted the rate and wiped out the 9-cent differential that existed between the Pittsburg thin-vein and Ohio. I do not care what you call it—there were premiums paid for certain things. In Indiana, where there was a fixed differential made for Illinois in the Danville field of 10 cents, Indiana was placed in a position, wedged in between the two districts, where they accepted a 12½-cent differential. In Indiana the miners had been forced on the mine run system, and with the prices fixed on account of the relation of Indiana to Illinois, and Ohio to Pennsylvania, it would have been a reduction to our men in that state. On the other hand, Indiana operators, had they accepted the other end of the proposition and placed all their mines on a machine mine-run system, would not have secured the same advantage the Danville District of Illinois did under the Chicago agreement.

p. 167, l. 24–46.

(79) "Mr. Lackey stated that Indiana paid for the settlement in Chicago. I want to deny that in as positive language as I can and say to Mr. Lackey and to other gentlemen here from Indiana that no condition was imposed upon that State, intentionally or unintentionally, that was calculated to be a detriment to it. No condition was imposed upon the Pittsburg people, although they were called upon to yield 9 cents of their wages. The miners of Ohio might say with equal force that they paid for the Chicago agreement for several months of a strike. If what Mr. Lewis says of the Massillon miners is correct, they might say they paid for it by sacrificing a half holiday. The Hocking operators refused to become a party to the Chicago agreement until some time just prior to the first of April. Upon that general principle the miners of all the districts covered by the Chicago agreement were called upon to make some sacrifice somewhere to effect that agreement. The truth of the matter is—and you must all know it—that prior to the Chicago convention conditions in the mining districts lacked uniformity to a very great extent, and in order to effect an agreement, it goes without saying, that they all had to give up something in order to be brought together. Indiana did its share. Ohio did its share, and Pennsylvania did its share. If the miners of any of those districts refused to do for the general good that which they were asked to do, there could have been no Chicago agreement."

Mr. Ratchford, Ohio.
p. 168, l. 38–50.
p. 169, l. 1–11.

(80) "In order to fix basing prices in the different districts and establish a general scale that was uniform in its application, with the purpose in view of bringing together all of the mine workers of the different States and all the day labor in the mines we had to make concessions here and there and everywhere in order to bring about that uniformity. In the Chicago convention, although it is made the subject of criticism more or less, more was accomplished for the mine workers of these states than has been accomplished by any convention since or before. The admission was made on the floor of the convention two years ago that the only advance you received since 1903 was 12½ per cent. The Chicago convention, saying nothing of any other considerations, secured a greater increase for you, besides equalizing the size of the screens—which were different sizes, lengths and breadths—made a uniform day wage scale and established an eight hour work day. It did more, it established the greatest co-operative association perhaps of employers and employes in the world, an association that has worked successfully for a greater number of years than any other similar organization, and has been of mutual advantage to both sides. The Chicago convention secured an advance of nearly 18 cents. I hope in your criticism of it and of the proceedings of that meeting, both here and elsewhere, you will at least be fair and represent the facts as you know them."

Mr. Ratchford, Ohio.
p. 170, l. 1–23.

(81) "When I said that the outcome of the Chicago conference was a bargain and sale I told the truth. What else was it?"

Mr. Lewis.
p. 170, l. 38, 39.

(82) "I believe the Chicago convention was a great affair, I believe it was one of the greatest economic affairs that ever transpired in this country up to this time;"

Mr. Lackey, Indiana.
p. 172, l. 15–17.

(83) "The chairman stated that the question before the house was a motion to adopt Section 1 of the miners' proposition.

"Secretary Brooks called the roll of states, both operators and miners. The representatives of the miners all voted in the affirmative, the representatives of the operators all voted in the negative and the motion was declared lost.

"Secretary Brooks read the second section of the miners' proposition as follows:

" 'An advance of ten cents per ton for pick mining and an equivalent advance for machine mining and a corresponding increase for all day work, dead work, yardage, etc.'

Mr. Feehan, Pennsylvania: "I move the adoption of the section as read.

"The motion was seconded by Mr. Greene, of Ohio.

"Secretary Brooks called the roll of States, both operators and miners. The representatives of the miners all voted in the affirmative, the representatives of the operators all voted in the negative, and the motion was declared lost."

p. 173, l. 7–24.

(84) "I think the fundamental basis on which this movement is established is to bring about as near as possible equal competitive opportunities and relations between the different districts. I cannot understand by what process of reasoning you can say in one district, or part of a district, that a certain price shall be paid for a certain class of work, and in another district, or in another portion of the same district, that a different or lower price shall be paid. I believe our movement has for its purpose that the labor cost of a ton of coal shall be about equal in the different districts."

Mr. Green, Ohio.
p. 175, l. 34–44.

(85) "I maintain that if a trimmer trims one hundred tons of coal in Eastern Ohio at a certain rate of wages, another man trimming the same amount of coal in the Pittsburg district should be paid the same rate of wages. It is a fair proposition. And the same is true in the different sub-districts within the district. I believe that from a competitive standpoint we ought to be paid, because it enables you to each be on the same footing, with competitive equality, and competitive opportunities. The labor cost for the production of a ton of coal, when a uniform rate of wage if paid, is the same to all and no man should expect any more than a square deal and an equal opportunity with another man."

Mr. Green.
p. 176, l. 27–39.

(86) "Mr. Lewis: I would like to ask a question. You desire to dispense with the labor of those so-called inefficient men, whether drivers or any other class of labor. Does that carry with it that such an individual can get employment in the mine if he desires?

"Mr. Penna: Sometimes, and sometimes not.

"Mr. Lewis: That is the point I wanted to bring out. As an organization we have not insisted on the retention of men who were inefficient and incompetent. We have asked and I might say we have insisted, that under our contract provisions, when a man is taken away from his employment because of his incompetency or inefficiency, he ought to in all fairness have a job mining coal, or loading coal, or whatever employment of that kind the operator has for him."

p. 180, l. 45, 46.

(87) "Mr. Penna: There could not very well be any exception taken to the statement of Mr. Lewis that their association has not insisted on the retention of men because of incompetency and inefficiency in the class of work they are performing. And I do not know but that can be said truthfully of every branch of the mine workers' association, but the local officers assume to decide upon the competency and the efficiency and the management is denied the right to decide that question. And invariably when there is an attempt made to move or to change men because of their incompetency or inefficiency, or because of common, ordinary laziness, we are accused of being prompted by ulterior motives, and it means a fight in the mines, a long drawn-out squabble, investigations, meetings of committees, argument—in fact, it is easier and cheaper for a coal operator oftentimes to keep a good for nothing cuss in his employ than it is for him to tread the devious course he is required to do to get rid of him. That is the situation, and yet the fact remains that we do not insist on retaining incompetent men. I have said to our people, and have insisted as far as I have been able to, that if a man came to build a fence for me and I had to pay for it I would decide absolutely and without interference as to his competency or as to whether I wanted to continue him to do that work. If I hired him to drive my wagon I would be the same, and if I was running a coal mine I would do the same or I would not run. The man who pays the price is the man who should be satisfied with the character of the work performed, and he alone should be permitted to decide whether or not that man is satisfactory to him in the performance of that work. If not, he should be permitted to remove him, and remove him promptly. If the coal operators were permitted to do that they would with profit, not only agree on your demands for a uniform day wage price, but they could afford to pay you more wages. That is not the case; they are not allowed to. That work is delegated to a committee and the committees are not usually, or not always at least, the most intelligent men in the mine."

p. 181, l. 12-46.

(88) Chairman Whetzel: "Are you ready to vote on the motion before the house? The motion pending is that the third section of the miners' proposition be divided. If there are no objections, we will vote on the motion to divide the proposition.

"Secretary Brooks called the roll of States. All the operators voted in the affirmative, all of the miners voted in the affirmative, and the motion to divide the third section of the miners' proposition was declared carried.

"Chairman Whetzel: The vote will now be on the first part of the proposition, 'That we demand a uniform rate of wages for all classes of inside and outside day labor.' The Secretary will call the roll.

"Secretary Brooks called the roll of states. All the miners' representatives voted in the affirmative, all the operators' representatives voted in the negative.

"Chairman Whetzel: Lacking a unanimous vote, the proposition is lost.

"Mr. Lewis moved the adoption of the second portion of the section, 'That time and a half be paid for over-time, Sundays and legal holidays.' (Seconded.)

"Secretary Brooks called the roll of States. All the miners voted in the affirmative, all the operators voted in the negative.

"Chairman Whetzel: Lacking a unanimous vote, the motion is lost."

p. 185, l. 12–35.

(89) "There being no further discussion on the proposition, the roll of States was called by Secretary Brooks. All the miners voted in the affirmative, all the operators voted in the negative, and the motion to adopt the fourth section of the miners' proposition was declared lost for want of a unanimous vote."

Mr. Lewis.
p. 186, l. 32–36.

(90) "I think the time is coming in the development of the coal industry of this country when we will be able to agree upon a minimum basis for mining and make it a perpetual contract. That is the kind of plan I have in mind. I do not know how soon it will come. There is only one thing in the way, and that is the lack of such an organization among the operators and the miners as we ought to have to govern the industry. I think if our friends on the other side could have a national organization and we could have a complete national organization on our side the time will come when we will establish the relative mining prices in the different districts, and we can afford to fix a minimum basis as a wage scale and make it a perpetual contract. We could go from that up, but not below it. If anybody tried to get below it we would attempt to find out who was trying to injure the trade."

Mr. Lewis.

p. 187, l. 5–19.

(91) "Secretary Brooks called the roll of States. All of the operators voted in the affirmative, all of the miners voted in the affirmative, and the motion to defer action on the fifth and sixth sections of the miners' proposition was declared carried.

p. 188, l. 22–25.

(92) "Back in about 1870 and up to about 1880 the most prominent coal field in Ohio was that known as the Mahoning Valley. The coal was mined on the run-of-mine basis. It was in the No. 1 seam. About that time the Mining Department was organized. There were a great many accidents for the amount of coal produced in the State. That field began to diminish in output and the Hocking field began to increase in output. As the Hocking field began to increase and the Mahoning Valley to go down the Tuscarawas came up and accidents began to decrease. The Mining Department took credit for better supervision and for the reduced number of accidents. In my judgment it was a matter of natural conditions. In the early days of the Hocking Valley and up to within a few years I never saw a safer seam of coal for men to work in. In the largest mine in the Mahoning Field there were men killed frequently, in fact there were more men killed than in the entire Hocking Field for years. When the Hocking Field was at its best the Eastern Ohio Fields were not very largely developed. There were a few mines around the Wheeling District, I believe, and there were a great many accidents. They had a bad roof. As the Eastern Ohio Field increased in production accidents began to increase. After the anthracite strike a great many coal mines were opened in Ohio."

Mr. Thomas, Pennsylvania.

(93) "If we had secured legislation that would impose hardships on the operators during a contract, it would have been different. We obtained no new legislation, however, and the operators introduced these things without our consent."

Mr. Feehan.
p. 194, l. 8–12.

(94) "The operators were in no way responsible for the changing of the explosives. They were commanded to do it by the mining department of the State of Pennsylvania."

Mr. Dempster, Pennsylvania.
p. 194, l. 19–22.

(95) "The seventh section of the miners' proposition was voted on. All the miners voted in the affirmative, all the operators voted in the negative, and the motion was declared lost.

"Secretary Brooks read Section 8 of the miners' proposition as follows:

"'There shall be no limit to the amount of deductions for the organization.'

"Mr. Bitner, Pennsylvania: I move the adoption of the section.

"The motion was seconded by Mr. Rollins, of Indiana.

"There being no discussion on the motion, Secretary Brooks called the roll of States. All the operators voted in the negative, all the miners voted in the affirmative.

"Chairman Whetzel: The proposition not receiving a unanimous vote, under the rules is declared lost.

"Secretary Brooks read the ninth section of the miners' proposition as follows:

"'That no district under the control of the United Mine Workers be permitted to enter into an agreement to reimburse the operators for any money expended for labor, directly or indirectly, wherein the law says the expense shall be borne by the operators.'

"Mr. Donovan, Pennsylvania: I move the adoption of the section.

"The motion was seconded by Mr. Laverick, Pennsylvania.

"There being no discussion on the motion, Secretary Brooks called the roll of States. All the operators voted in the negative, all the miners in the affirmative, and the motion was declared lost."

p. 196, l. 47–49.
p. 197, l. 1–25.

(96) "Mr. Lewis: In order to get this before the committee, I move that we refer the entire subject matter we have had under discussion to a sub-committee of two miners and two operators from each of the districts represented in this conference.

"The motion was seconded by Mr. Zerbe."

p. 198, l. 13–17.

(97) "Mr. Green, Ohio: I believe this motion should be amended to provide that the commissioners from each district and the International officers from our side should be made members and participate in the work of the subcommittee. While there may be two members from each district in the sub-committee from the miners' side, I am sure we want also the International officers.

"Mr. Chapman: They have always been in the committee.

"Mr. Green: If we ask to have them in I think it is no more than right that you should have on your side such commissioners as you may designate.

"Mr. Zerbe: Change that to commissioners of parties interested.

"Mr. Chapman: If that is understood there is no necessity of an amendment.

"Mr. Green: If there are no objections the motion is not necessary.

"Chairman Whetzel: In the Joint Convention you adopted the rules that governed the Toledo meeting. In this committee you adopted the rules that governed the Joint Committee in Toledo. When we say International officials, let it be understood as it was in Toledo to include the President, Vice-President and Secretary-Treasurer.

"The motion offered by Mr. Lewis was adopted."

p. 199, l. 17–40.

(98) "The miners announced the appointment of the following members of the sub-committee: Ohio, G. W. Savage, William Green; Pennsylvania, Francis Feehan, S. A. Whetzel; Indiana bituminous, W. P. Rollins, G. W. Lackey; Indiana block coal, George Morgenthaler, J. D. Holden."

p. 200, l. 6–10.

(99) "Mr. Sullivan, Ohio: Before you put the motion, I desire to make a statement. Yesterday afternoon in discussing the question of the men who are found to be incompetent to take charge of the different parts of the work in the mines, I stated, and so did Mr. Lewis, that we had no objection to the removal of men if they are not competent, or if their habits are such that in handling dangerous machinery they would endanger their lives or the lives of others. We would certainly not object to the removal of such men. If a driver or a day man is found not doing his duty or neglecting his duty we will not object to his removal. We followed that up with a statement that you had a right to remove such men, but we hold the right to investigate as to whether or not the removal was correct. I want to remove a wrong impression the Indiana operators may have in regard to this matter. You give us an investigation at all times in regard to those men.

"Chairman Whetzel: We will take notice of that later on.

"Mr. Sullivan: I want to have the record clear on that question.

"Mr. Lewis: Whatever I said stands on the records. I am not going to ask the operators whether or not we are to have a right to investigate. If we make a contract that contract will determine the matter."

p. 200, l. 14–36.

(100) REPORT OF SUB-SCALE COMMITTEE.

"Secretary Brooks, for the committee, reported as follows:

"To the Scale Committee of Western Pennsylvania, Ohio and Indiana, Miners and Operators:

"Gentlemen: Your sub-scale committee, appointed by you Saturday, March 12, 1910, met at the Assembly Room of the Hotel Sinton on Monday, March 14, at 2 o'clock p. m., and organized by electing

Mr. S. A. McCullough, Chairman.

Mr. F. S. Brooks, Secretary.

Mr. Edwin Perry, Assistant Secretary.

"After this and further sessions through the mornings and afternoons of Tuesday and Wednesday, March 15 and 16, they now report that they have been unable to agree.

S. A. McCullough, Chairman.
F. S. Brooks, Secretary.
Edwin Perry, Assistant Secretary."

p. 201, l. 9–25.

(101) "Mr. Lewis: It is quite evident the sub-committee was not able to agree on anything. I think we have about reached the period in our deliberations now where we will probably have to report to the Interstate Joint Convention, unless it is the desire of the parties to take up for discussion the questions we have had before us. I realize that we have discussed practically every phase of the situation and have reached that point, according to the report of the sub-committee, where our business is practically at an end. I realize the seriousness of the situation. I realize what it means to the mining industry of this country. I appreciate the fact that if we go away from here without an agreement it means industrial war, with all the attendant hardships that naturally follow in the wake of such a condition. I think for that reason, even at this time, we can afford to make haste slowly. Unless we are going to take up again the discussion of the matter before we decide to adjourn and report to the Interstate Convention we desire to report to our own convention. The operators may wish to do the same. However, I am not speaking for the operators, but for our own people. There is nothing left for us to do but report the action of this Joint Committee to the Joint Convention. That is the body that created this committee, but before we report to them the miners would like to report to their own convention. We will then be able to join you in reporting to the Interstate Joint Convention."

p. 201, l. 31–43.
p. 202, l. 1–11.

(102) "Mr. Zerbe: I want it understood that this is not an Interstate Joint Convention; it is a Tri-State Conference. The Interstate Joint Convention is a thing of the past. We have not recognized it during the present meeting.

"Mr. Lewis: I do not want to split hairs, but in discussing this matter I want to use any language I wish to express my ideas. This is an Inter-State meeting. If you want to call it a Tri-State meeting it is all right; I have no objections, but I fail to see where there is any difference in the position taken by Mr. Zerbe and myself, but out of deference to his wishes we will call it the Tri-State Convention after this."

p. 202, l. 28–38.

(103) "One thing is certain, and that is that we would like to have an agreement; that we would like to avoid a suspension of operations in the mining industry. We are going to do everything in our power to avert such a contingency; but if we are unable to reach conclusions the natural outcome will be that you gentlemen will endeavor to fix the responsibility upon us and our people will endeavor to fix the responsibility upon you."

Mr. Lewis.
p. 204, l. 18–25.

(104) "I do know as a general proposition that men will buy where they can buy the cheapest, counting quality and quantity; and when it comes to coal it does not matter where it is mined, it does not matter by whom it is mined, the consumers of coal in this country are after cheap coal and they will buy it where they can get it for the least possible price. They always have done that and they always will.

"I do not wish to refer to anything that was said in the sub-committee; but you gentlemen know that the difference between the cost of production in the union fields and the non-union fields is not what is paid to labor alone. After you have paid the laboring man in the union field more for mining coal and the day man more for doing their work, there is an additional cost in the union fields that they do not have in the non-union fields. There is a cost of production, and, whether you account for it or not, it is there and it must be charged up to the fact of the existence of the union and the union's meddlesomeness and unwarranted interference with the operation of the property. That is not a small item. I say to you people here now that the United Mine Workers, as we meet you here face to face as men doing business, are not the United Mine Workers we meet at home around the mines. You are two separate and distinct organizations. Here we meet you as men who profess to be fair and who try to be fair; but when we go home and undertake to operate the mines with union labor we meet with the criminally inclined, with the men who have no respect for law nor order nor the rights of others, who have no respect for anything but their own desires, with or without reason. And we meet with district officers who are depending upon that kind of votes to perpetuate and continue them in office, and they are ready to wink at the dishonorable conduct of the men, if not openly and squarely endorse it. In some instances they do that. Ten cents a ton advance for mining in a non-union field would not mean the same as it would in the union fields. Ten cents a ton advance in a union field in excess of a non-union field, with an additional cost for other labor around the mines, only represents a part of the in-eased cost of production of coal in a union field as against non-union field. I don't know how many of you know ese things, but I know that some of you know them."

Mr. Penna, Indiana.
p. 207, l. 21–51.
p. 208, l. 1–8.

(105) "I don't know whether this institution is going live or die. I have loved it and have worked for it. iave worked for it as faithfully and arduously as anybody uld; but if in this institution we have reached a point iere we are invited to go up against ultimatums, where are met with propositions dubbed conservative—and ou gentlemen the judges absolutely as to whether or not ey are conservative—if we are to be told that things e reasonable, and you are to be the absolute judges of e correctness of that statement, then this institution ght to die. If it has reached that state it has ceased to useful and thereby forfeited its right to life."

Mr. Penna, Indiana.

(106) "The very inception of this movement was a mpetitive basis, competitive abilities, competitive rela-nships—these are the very fundamental principles on ich this thing was organized many years ago and on ich it was continued. All we say now is, 'Put us in a sition where we can market our coal in competition with r mutual enemies and with each other and we ask no re.' Your position is, 'Competition or no competition, want an advance, and we want it because we are big ough to take it.'

'Now I am not going to express any regret or sorrow the breaking up of this institution. If it has to break on this proposition, the breaking up ought to be a year ubilee, because we cannot be any worse off and we may possibly be better. At least we will get to squirming around and try to get something else as a substitute. We cannot find anything worse, and anything we find will have to be as good, if not a little bit better. If the movement has outlived its usefulness it ought to die. It will die, and the only sorrow I shall feel in connection with it will be the sorrow I would naturally feel at the passing of an old, old friend who could not, in the ordinary course of things, expect anything else and who, in the course of the law of nature, must die. This will pass the same way if it has to pass."

p. 210, l. 5–26.

(107) "Secretary Perry: I want to answer a few of the statements made. I am not ready to say that this joint movement has outlived its usefulness. For a number of years I have maintained the belief that it was founded as a result of linking together modern thought and advanced ideas to add stability to the mining industry. I believe it has, and I believe it will continue, if these latent forces exercise their function, to be a power for good in the future."

p. 211, l. 21–28.

(108) "The price paid for mining in West Virginia is not the only cost of production. Those men have bills to pay that you do not, and you know it. It is not necessary that I should mention what they are. As a result of the organization trying to organize that field there is an added cost to the production of those operators. In my judgment, as far as the unorganized fields are concerned, if the miners are paid an advance in the organized fields I do not believe it will be possible for the mines in West Virginia to operate and pay the present rate of wages."

Secretary Perry.

(109) "The miner is not consulted about what coal is going to be sold for, and if we undertook to say to our friends on the other side what they should sell their coal for, if we were not told it in plain language, the intimation would be strongly conveyed to us that it was none of our business—and very properly so. On the other hand, we are unwilling for any operators to attempt to invade markets, when it comes to a standpoint of competition, and reduce the selling price of coal in order that that market may be enlarged, and then come back to us and tell us we must foot the bill. We are not going to do it.

"It is recognized that we have some right to help fix the standard of payment for our labor, and when the gentlemen on the other side agree with us on that standard, or fail to agree and we fix the standard ourselves, in order not to go out of business it becomes necessary for them to be a little more careful in regulating the selling price of coal."

p. 215, l. 12-28.

(110) "The extra cost in producing a ton of coal outside of contract provisions referred to in this meeting is recognized by myself as one of the representatives of the United Mine Workers. If a mine stops one single day when there is work to be done, contracts to be filled and cars on the sidings to be loaded, if everything is prepared to go ahead with the day's work, there is an unnecessary added cost in producing coal under such conditions."

Mr. Lewis.
p. 216, l. 3-9.

(111) "You have too much politics in the organization in the United Mine Workers of America. You are not here in good faith; you are not here asking it because you need the advance in pay; you are asking it because some one committed himself by saying the miners would get it. We stand here in good faith and say that we have raised your pay from the time we started negotiating with you to the present, and now we have got to that level of the value of your labor where we cannot go any further and compete with those who do not pay the same."

Mr. Zerbe, Ohio.
p. 221, l. 28–36.

(112) "I recognize that there is competition from West Virginia; I recognize also that there has been keener competition between the operators making contracts with us than between them and the operators of West Virginia."

Mr. Lewis.
p. 224, l. 25–28.

(113) Mr. Feehan: "I know the miners I represent, and if they are going to starve, they will not starve in the mines. If they take my advice, they will get the advance they are asking for in these demands or the mines will be idle. It will be unprofitable for us to work, and we will find out whether or not it is unprofitable for the operators to operate under the figures we state.

"Mr. Dempster: I do not understand fully what you said about the profits and the stoppage of the mines.

"Mr. Feehan: I said if the miners take my advice they will get the advance they are asking for or the mines will be idle. It will be unprofitable for us to work, and we will find out whether or not it is unprofitable for the operators to operate at the figures we stated."

p. 226, l. 10–23.

(114) "You are going to give us an advance and you are going to give us better conditions because you can afford to do so. You are going to get greater prices for your coal, and there is not going to be a suspension. If you do not sign an agreement here, you will realize before the first of April that it will be cheaper to pay the advance."

Mr. Feehan.
p. 227, l. 48.
p. 228, l. 1–5.

(115) "Mr. Dempster, Pennsylvania: Do you mean that you will take the position of laying down an ultimatum for us that we must sign a scale for run-of-mine, an advance in the price, and pledge ourselves to carry out certain conditions that may be included in that scale?

"Mr. Feehan: Those are the demands of the miners of our district.

"Mr. Dempster: Is that your ultimatum?

"Mr. Feehan: So far as I am concerned the ultimatum is the demands of the miners.

"Mr. Dempster: That is the ultimatum—either swallow that or choke?

"Mr. Feehan: So far as I am concerned."

p. 228, l. 14–26.

(116) "Mr. Zerbe: I did not state that any information was derived from any of the United Mine Workers when I spoke of politics in your organization. I am pleased to say I never heard a United Mine Worker express himself in that way yet; they have been always loyal to the organization. An advance was given you at one time in Indianapolis because one gentleman, I have good reason to believe, hoped to be made a United States Senator."

p. 230, l. 3–9.

(117) "Mr. Chapman: I have very few statements to make now; but I want to correct one statement made by Brother Lewis when he said there had been no serious complaint from any part of Ohio concerning competition with West Virginia except from Eastern Ohio. If you will read the records you will find the statement I made was that the business of the Hocking Valley and other districts of Ohio was being absorbed and taken from every part of the territory in which Ohio coal had been sold, and I cited by name many sections of the country ranging from the Ohio River to the lakes where the business was being taken by West Virginia coal. That is the statement I made on the floor of the Joint Convention, in the Scale Committee and everywhere else."

p. 230, l. 20–31.

(118) "Secretary Brooks read section 8 of the miners' proposition, as follows:

"'There shall be no limit to the amount of deductions for the organization.'

"Mr. Bitner, Pennsylvania: I move the adoption of the section. (Seconded by Mr. Halapy.)

"Mr. Feehan: I believe this is a question that has not been given very much consideration. There have been practically no arguments on their demand for an unlimited deduction for the organization, and I want to say for the miners of the Pittsburg District that we believe we should regulate the amount of deductions, either for the organization or for other purposes, charitable or otherwise. This matter should be left exclusively with us. In view of the fact that it is a part of the agreements in other States that are represented here, we believe it should become part of the Interstate Agreement. I hope to see this part of the miners' demands agreed to.

"Secretary Brooks called the roll of States on the motion to adopt Section 8. All the miners voted in the affirmative, all the operators voted in the negative, and the motion was declared lost for want of a unanimous vote."

p. 235, l. 6–26.

(119) "During our deliberations on the question of conceding to the mine workers an advance in wages the operators' strongest argument was their inability to pay an advance because of the alleged competition from certain sections of West Virginia. Our answer to that argument has been that it was not competition from West Virginia that caused the low selling price of coal in the districts represented in this meeting. Our arguments and our statements have been that because of the competition among the gentlemen who are in this convention the selling price of coal is as low as they claim. We have challenged the operators to refute that statement, and up to this time they have not been able to successfully do so. We claim, Mr. Chairman, that we are on the eve—no, we are right in the midst—of the beginning of one of the most prosperous industrial periods this country has experienced in the last twenty-five or thirty years. We claim that the operators will share in this era of prosperity; we claim that every manufacturer in this country of ours will do likewise; we claim—and there is every evidence to support our proposition—that the railroad companies controlling the transportation systems, the men who purchase the largest part of the commodity we produce, will share likewise in this prosperity that now is here and that will grow brighter and better for the next few years. We claim that because of these conditions we, as mine workers, must share in these improved conditions, and we are unwilling to renew a wage contract that will not carry with it an advance in our wages. Our friends on the other side of this proposition have been compelled to acknowledge the abnormal increase in the cost of living. There is no disputing the fact that our men, as far as their earning power is concerned, coupled with the purchasing power of the results of their labor, are not as well off today as they were ten years ago, or at any time between that period and the present.

"We have weighed well the consequence of failure to reach an agreement in this convention. We know what a suspension of work means to us, and we know what it means to the mining industry of this country. We know what inconvenience may result to all other branches of industry; we fully realize that we must discommode the American people. We have weighed all phases of the question carefully, and, having done so, we have made up our minds that any contract fixing the wages and governing our employment must carry with it an advance. (Applause.)"

Mr. Lewis.
p. 241, l. 1–21.

(120) "We are entitled to the first consideration in these matters, and other people, outside of the mine workers, and the mine owners, are entitled to second consideration. I know that in making that declaration it may be hurled across the country that the mine workers are selfish men; that they are not mindful for the interest of other people. We have to consider that phase of the situation and count the cost in the event we are compelled to resort to a suspension of work in order that we can secure an advance in wages and meet our honest obligations."

Mr. Lewis.
p. 242, l. 1, 2.

(121) "Mr. Lewis says that the present condition of the industry is due to unwise competition. The Government of the United States and the Government of the State of Ohio says that we must compete. There are probing investigations all over the United States today trying to find out whether or not there are combinations in restraint of trade, whether there are combinations being formed for the purpose of getting high prices. Do you think that in the face of that the operators sitting on this side of the house can in any manner or in any form get together and say, 'Our price is so and so'? I am free to admit that if it were not for this condition, and if the law of the land permitted it, if there were no restrictions, no complications, we might get together and fix the price of coal."

Mr. Maurer, Ohio.
p. 243, l. 5–17.

(122) "Every miner in the Hocking Valley knows that a few years ago your products went on the Great Lakes to supply the domestic markets of the great Northwest. The docks were filled with it. The homes and the business places of the Northwest were supplied with it. Who supplies them now? The splint coals of West Virginia. These coals are mined so cheap that Hocking coal cannot touch them. Is that competition? Tell me, Mr. Lewis, are the operators on this side of the house doing nothing to meet these conditions? They have invested millions in the Northwest in docks so that our coal can be placed there, so that we can take care of that market. People sitting on this side of the house, through their industrial efforts, have induced the great railroads of the Northwest to handle their coal and buy it for steam purposes. I went to the mines with one of the purchasing agents of one of those roads, Mr. McDonald. I went there with him to demonstrate the value of our coal, and we supplied a million and a half tons of that coal to the Northwest for that trade. For the past two years, however, in order to keep those docks and protect our interests we sold that coal at 80 cents a ton to meet the competition of West Virginia. Is that competition? Every dock owner on this side of the house, were not his mining properties of more value than the docks, would have put Virginia coal in there because it was cheaper; they would not have put a pound of Ohio coal there. They have done their share to protect the industry.

"Have we no markets left that can be protected? Go to the city of Columbus, right in the heart of the Hocking District, and how much Hocking coal do you find there? Go into Marion, go into the little town of Lima, Ohio, and you will find a 100,000 tons of West Virginia coal supplying a contract there. Go into Toledo and what do you find? There was one contract of 60,000 that I went after myself, and if I could have made a price of 75 cents to meet the competition I could have had the business. And your President dares to tell me there is no competition from West Virginia! I know what I am talking about. I know what we sold coal for, and I know that every ton of coal we sold to meet those market conditions was sold at an absolute loss."

Mr. Maurer, Ohio.
p. 244, l. 10–46.

(123) "Am I fair? Gentlemen, there may be States in the Southwest, there may be other States and districts that are able to pay an advance; but do not crush this State between the upper and the nether millstone of high wages on the one side and non-union competition on the other."

Mr. Maurer, Ohio.
p. 245, l. 16–20.

(124) "I do say, however, that there is no law in this country to compel you to sell your coal or to give it away. There is no law in the United States that will compel us to labor if we don't want to."

Mr. Lewis.
p. 246, l. 35–38.

(125) "I do not propose to attempt to defend the non-union fields of West Virginia. I know, as do the other miners on this side, that the non-union product of West Virginia is a serious proposition. As evidence that we recognize that fact, out of the meager earnings of the men on this side we have contributed month after month and year after year to try to organize that field and bring them up to a competitive basis with our friends on this side."

Mr. Green, Ohio.
p. 251, l. 39–45.

(126) "Unfortunately we do not regulate the selling end of it. We have nothing to do except with the producing end of it."

Mr. Feehan, Pennsylvania.
p. 256, l. 32, 33.

(127) "I am not talking to the great American public, and I don't want to. I know what the American public will do for you and for this side of the house. The American public will get its fuel where it can get it cheapest, and the fact that your children are crying for bread will not influence the purchase of a single ton of coal if the American public can purchase the same amount of coal for five cents less. The American public will buy coal from the gentlemen on this side just as long as they can sell it a little cheaper than someone else, and they will pat them on the back while they do it; but when the other fellow comes along and offers the same coal for a fraction of a cent less, regardless of the location of the market, regardless of wages or anything else, they will buy it from him. I admit no responsibility to anybody anywhere except from that side of the house to this, and from this side to that."

Mr. Penna, Indiana.
p. 259, l. 18–32.

(128) "The production of coal in itself is not a peculiar thing to those who know how to produce it. Marketing coal is not in itself a mysterious proposition. To secure a fair price when selling coal is not a difficult thing when those who have charge of fixing the selling price will endeavor to get together for that purpose."

Mr. Lewis.
p. 260, l. 12–16.

(129) "I pause, however, long enough to inquire, 'What is the use?' It is true that in every joint convention I have ever attended—and I believe that I have attended all of them that have been held—the miners formulated their demands, then came in and presented them; the operators formulated other and opposite demands sometimes and presented them; but in the miners' demands were no ultimatums and in the operators' demands were no ultimatums. Throughout the entire negotiations there was a position on both sides of flexibility—for want of a better term. If I could find a better term I would use it. Even my friend Lewis in attempting to refute my statement has said, and he has done persistently, that the contract must carry with it an advance in wages. Heretofore I have never seen the miners come into a joint convention in such a position and assume such an attitude."

Mr. Penna.

(130) "What is the matter that we haven't the opportunity to work? Men who are producing the same commodity you are, cause your lack of opportunity to work."

Mr. Chapman.
p. 267, l. 44–46.

(131) "Isn't it time, gentlemen, that the industry in Ohio and in other States that are unionized should be protected? With more than half the entire product of the country produced by non-union men, if we are to protect and perpetuate our industry in Indiana, Ohio and Western Pennsylvania, we should call a halt. Do you want to destroy the industry in Ohio that in the past has been equal in value to all the wheat produced within the State? If you continue your demands you will bring that result to the industry."

Mr. Chapman.

(132) "Mr. Chapman, Ohio: I ask by what authority any gentleman has the right to offer upon the part of Ohio a proposition for an advance of 5 cents a ton, except he be an Ohio man?

"Mr. Lewis: We have made contracts in the past for Ohio, even when the Ohio operators were not present. We have made agreements after the block coal operators of Indiana had taken part in the deliberations and withdrawn. We have agreed on the terms of a contract, and it was up to the miners then to see that it was carried into effect. Is there any motion before the house?"

p. 272, l. 3–12.

(133) "Mr. Lewis: In moving the adoption of the report of the committee I recognize that it brings this conference face to face with a crisis in the mining industry of our country. I recognize that the adoption of this motion may carry with it a suspension of work in the mines of this country from one end to the other. The adoption of this motion, unless there is some method found to negotiate the provisions of a contract that may be reasonably satisfactory to the miners and operators, will carry with it the withdrawal of every proposition that has been under consideration, so far as the mine workers are concerned. It may mean the formulation by the convention of the United Mine Workers of a policy that will mean industrial war, with all the attendant hardships that are incident to such a condition in our mining affairs. I recognize that there are some men in the mining industry on the mine owners' side who may temporarily benefit by reason of a suspension of work. I know that there are men in the mining industry, as there are in Wall Street, New York, who are gambling in a commodity that is so important in the life of the industries of this country. I have every reason to believe there are some mine owners who have stocked a certain amount of coal contingent on being able to earn a large profit as a result of a suspension of operations. I recognize also the possibility of some of those men doing everything they can in their power, directly and indirectly, to force a suspension of the operation of the mines. I recognize in addition to that—and I want to state the position of the miners plainly and positively—that it has been the hope, the desire, the ambition and the work of some operators to prevent a settlement, with the expectation that the mine workers of this country would tie themselves up with a policy that everyone would have to sign a contract before anyone would be permitted to sign.

"I have said before, and I repeat now, that those operators can eliminate from their minds any such delusions as that, if they now possess them. I want also to emphasize the fact that in the event of these three States adjourning this Joint Tri-State Conference without an agreement, it will not prevent the miners' representatives from inviting the representatives of the operators of a less number of states or a less number of districts than are here represented to come into a joint meeting for the purpose of endeavoring to negotiate the terms of a wage contract. And if we, as miners, and the operators of some districts are able to negotiate the terms of an agreement that will be reasonably satisfactory to the miners and the operators who may become parties to such an agreement. I want to emphasize another fact, and that is that the operators who may retire from this meeting and take no part at this time in negotiating a wage contract cannot expect to have the assurance that they will be able to negotiate a contract on the same basis as operators who may sign the agreement in this city before we leave. In other words, operators who retire from the movement do it of their own accord, accepting with it all the responsibilities, and must if they engage in a struggle, be governed by the conditions of that contest. If they are successful in an inevitable contest that will take place, I am willing to admit that they will fix the terms of any settlement that may be agreed upon between them and their employes. But if the mine workers are successful in that contest, then I want to say now, in order that our position may be clearly understood, that we will dictate the terms upon which any settlement is made with us. We want this understood at this time, in order that the people of this country will know our position as mine workers."

p. 285, l. 6–49.

(134) "It must be borne in mind also that the mining industry of the country is depending upon the outcome of he negotiations in this city. It must be understood—and it is known to the operators, whether they will admit it or not—that the operators of the outlying districts who are not represented in this conference will pay such an advance in wages as may be agreed upon by the operators and the miners of this Joint Convention. The operators who will cause the adjournment of this joint meeting are assuming more than the responsibility of causing a disagreement in this instance. They are assuming the responsibility of a possible suspension of mining operations from one end of the country to the other, and they will not be permitted to shirk that responsibility so far as we are concerned."

Mr. Lewis.
p. 286, l. 29–42.

(135) "The unfortunate situation is this—and that is why an inter-state or a tri-state agreement sometimes works a hardship upon both parties—but the situation is that upon the wage scale adopted here the whole bituminous fields of the country base their wage scale; and whether the miners of this particular field or this particular State are entitled to an increase or not, if they fail to get the increase then that result follows all over the country."

Mr. Maurer.
p. 296, l. 39–46.

(136) "Turn the Ohio operators and miners loose from this convention, say that you will not handicap them."

Mr. Maurer.
p. 298, l. 15, 16.

(137) "There are but four more working days left, and as one I do not want to go up to the ragged edge of the expiration of our contract, because if we are going to do that by preliminary, or a continuance of negotiations, then as a representative of the miners we will be required to formulate a circular notifying our entire membership that if they do not get word to the contrary before the end of the month there will be a suspension of work."

Mr. Lewis.
p. 300, l. 11–18.

(138) "If this partnership continues there must eventually be a time when we must either adopt some fair method or we must part company."

Mr. Maurer.
p. 304, l. 2–5.

(139) "Mr. Lewis: I do not know whether I have made our position clear. I have tried to. We have reached the point now where we are going to waste no more time. I do not want to be understood as saying we have wasted any up to this time, but our people think we have. I recognize that we have been unable to reach an agreement up to this time. It seems to be absolutely hopeless for us to reach an agreement here, from the statement made by one of the gentlemen on the other side to me a moment ago. I want to make it clear now that if we can adjourn this joint conference of the three districts we still have left an opportunity to see whether or not we can negotiate a contract that will be reasonably satisfactory to all parties concerned. And when this convention adjourns—and it is going to adjourn quite soon— we are going to ask all the operators of Indiana and Western Pennsylvania to remain. We will also ask all the operators of Ohio to remain who will do so with the distinct understanding that any agreement that will be finally negotiated will carry with it an advance in wages. We may just as well talk out in the open. I have been trying to do it all the time. I would rather that the operators and the miners of the three States would agree. If there is the least hope that by the representatives of the three States going into a scale committee, or even if there is the least hope of their agreeing here, I would favor such a procedure. There is a limit to how long we can stay here, because there are only four days left in this month, and if our men suspend work on the first day of April—and that is what they will do if there is no agreement—then the time would be passed for talking about negotiating, especially with the mines in operation, for they will then be idle. I have always been opposed to negotiating contracts or settling disputes while the mines are idle. Our friends from Ohio say, 'Let us go out of the conference.' While I am going to say it as kindly as possible—and I dislike very much to say it at all—there is nothing to prevent the operators who are unwilling to negotiate a contract with an advance in wages from retiring from the meeting. However, it is preferable to move an adjournment of this Tri-State Convention in order to see whether anybody else wants to make an effort to negotiate a contract.

"We are not going to precipitate a suspension of work or a strike without exhausting all reasonable efforts at our command. We are unwilling to go into a scale committee meeting for the purpose of prolonging discussion, and I might say that we will not do it. This thing must be settled one way or the other, and that very soon. The limitation of time itself will settle the question. Much as I would like to spend to-morrow as other people will spend it, we are going to occupy our time tonight and tomorrow in outlining our plan completely to meet any emergency that may develop in the mining industry of this country on and after April 1. We are going to be ready to negotiate a wage contract, or, if compelled to, we are going to be ready to the best we can to defend our rights as wage earners to sell our labor at the best possible price in order to get sufficient to meet our obligations and take care of our families as American families ought to be taken care of."

p. 310, l. 8–48.
p. 311, l. 1–12.

(140) "I concede to you gentlemen, the same rights that I claim for myself. I have no right to say to you, 'You shall work at less wages than you want to,' you have a right to quit any time you desire, and we have a right to say that we will not operate our properties if we do not want to. We have a right to say further that if we find men who have heretofore been in our employ who are willing to work in our properties at the wages we can afford to pay, if they say they can make a good living at those wages and that their earnings are sufficient to support themselves and their families under the laws of this country we have a right to employ them and they have a right to work for us.

"I hope that your President, representing your body of men, not only here but in various other fields of this country that he says are depending upon whatever adjustment may be made here to fix their scale of wages, will present for our consideration a clean-cut proposition covering all the points at issue between us."

Mr. Chapman, Ohio.
p. 312, l. 48–51.
p. 313, l. 1–13.

(141) "We have been at this work now since January. We are tired, just as tired as you gentlemen are, and the only expression we have been able to get from you gentlemen is, 'agree to an advance in wages, and we are going home without strings to us to increase that advance twofold if we can.' We know what it means! We are not going to agree to an advance in the mining rate and then take the chance of going back to our respective States and have it duplicated, or have to go into the same industrial war we would have to go into if we failed to agree here. We would just as soon fight, if fight we must, as the result of a disagreement here as to fight for a disagreement in our own respective districts. It is war all the same, and there is not any more hell in it if it is inaugurated in the districts than if it is inaugurated here."

Mr. Penna.
p. 317, l. 17–31.

(142) "This movement cannot continue if we pursue the kind of policy I think I have observed here, that of seeking to take advantage, that desire to gamble by making the rules and playing the game."

Mr. Penna.
p. 318, l. 38–40.

(143) "I fail to see where there is any necessity of prolonging the sessions after what has been said by the operators this morning. When I say a thing myself I mean what I say and am willing to support that position to the limit. I want to say now that whatever policy is outlined by the miners in separate convention, that policy will be carried into effect so far as I am concerned until victory is perched upon the banner of the United Mine Workers, or until we are completely routed from one end of this country to the other. I want to say that under like circumstances, if it shall fall to the lot of the miners to be defeated, then I shall recognize the right—because I shall be compelled to—of the operators to name the terms under which we will be permitted to labor. On the other hand, if we are successful everything within the power of human agency will be done to make this impending conflict a success.

"Then as the victors we will say to those on the other side that we will dictate the terms upon which we will be employed, or upon which our labor will be sold to those who operate and manage the mines of this country."

Mr. Lewis.
p. 356, l. 44–49.
p. 357, l. 1–13.

(144) "CHECK OFF.

"17. Operators will make collection for the miners dues of 50 cents per month, with an addition to this of one-half of 1 per cent of the gross earnings, which shall be collected when the miners so request. Special assessments for the National Body to be deducted as requested by the miners. Initiation fees to be taken off, but not to exceed one dollar per man in any one pay. This to apply to employes inside the mine only.

"Notice of such collection to be given at the mine on the first and sixteenth day of each month for the succeeding pay.

"Collections for the Union shall follow checkweighman, accident and death benefits, rent and smithing."

PICK MINING—Thick Vein.

(174) "SECTION I—TURNS.

"There shall be no free turns allowed to either rooms or entries. The entries may be driven as fast as operators desire, or conditions permit. But in no case shall entry miners be allowed more cars per week than room miners, and at least once each week the turn shall be made uniform for the time previously worked. However, should the operator desire to drive entries faster than the single shift with the aforesaid uniform turn permits, the operator shall be privileged to increase the number of shifts in said entries, but in no case shall either shift receive more cars than the uniform turn throughout the mine permits. Should miners refuse to double shift said entries, the operators are to have the right to give regular entry men free turn, or to increase the number of men in such entries. Nothing in this section to prevent fast turns."

Contract between the machine operators of the Block Coal District and the Executive Board of District No. 8, United Mine Workers of America, governing prices and conditions of mining in machine mines, Block Coal District.

(231) "CHICAGO AGREEMENT, 1898.

"Chicago, January 28.—Contract between the operators of the central competitive coal field and the United Mine Workers of America.

'The following agreement, made and entered into in Joint Inter-state Convention in this city (Chicago, Ill.) January 26, 1898, by and between the operators and miners of Illinois, Indiana, Ohio and Western Pennsylvania, known as the Pittsburg thin vein district, witnesseth:

'1. That an equal price for mining screened lump coal shall hereafter form a base scale in all the districts above named, excepting the State of Illinois, the block coal district of Indiana to pay 10 cents per ton over that of Hocking Valley, Western Pennsylvania and Indiana bituminous district; and that the price of pick run-of-mine coal in Hocking Valley and Western Pennsylvania shall be determined by the actual percentage of screenings passing through such screens as is hereinafter provided, it being understood and agreed that screened or run-of-mine coal may be mined and paid for on the above basis at the option of the operators, according to market requirements, and the operators of Indiana bituminous shall also have like option of mining and paying for run-of-mine or screen coal.

'2. That the screen hereby adopted for the State of Ohio, Western Pennsylvania and the bituminous district of Indiana shall be uniform in size, six feet wide by twelve feet long, built of flat or akron-shaped bar of not less than five-eighths of an inch surface, with one and one-fourth inches between bars, free from obstructions, and that such screen shall rest upon a sufficient number of bearings to hold the bars in proper position.

'3. That the block coal district of Indiana may continue the use of the diamond screen of present size and pattern with the privilege of run-of-mine coal, the mining price of which shall be determined by the actual screenings; and that the State of Illinois shall be absolutely upon a run-of-mine system, and shall be paid for on that basis.

'4. That an advance of 10 cents per ton of 2,000 pounds for pick-mined screened coal shall take effect in Western Pennsylvania, Hocking Valley and Indiana bituminous districts on April 1, 1898, and that Grape Creek, Ill., and the bituminous district of Indiana shall pay 40 cents per ton run-of-mine coal from and after same date, based upon 66 cents per ton screened coal in Ohio, Western Pennsylvania and the Indiana bituminous district, same to continue in force until the expiration of this contract.

'5. That on and after April 1, 1898, the eight-hour work day with eight hours' pay, consisting of six days per week, shall be in effect in all of the districts represented, and that uniform wages for day labor shall be paid the different classes of labor in the fields named, and that internal differences in any of the states or districts, both as to prices or conditions, shall be referred to the states or districts affected for adjustment.

'6. That the same relative prices and conditions between machine and pick mining that have existed in the different states shall be continued during the life of this contract.

'7. That present prices for pick and machine mining and all classes of day labor shall be maintained in the competitive states and districts until April 1, 1898.

'8. That the United Mine Workers' organization, a party to this contract, do hereby further agree to afford all possible protection to the trade and to the other parties hereto against any unfair competition resulting from a failure to maintain scale rates.

'That this contract shall remain in full force and effect from April 1, 1898 to April 1, 1899, and that our next annual inter-state convention shall convene in the city of Pittsburg on the third Tuesday in January, 1899. Adopted.

(232) "COLUMBUS DAY WAGE SCALE.

INSIDE DAY WAGE SCALE FOR AN EIGHT-HOUR DAY.

Columbus, Ohio, March 10, 1898.

"The following resolution was adopted at a meeting of the scale committee of the Interstate Convention at Chicago January 22, 1898:

Resolved, That two operators and two miners from each state meet at Columbus, Ohio, on the second Tuesday in March (or March 8), 1898, at the Chittenden Hotel to formulate a uniform day work scale based upon the district upon which the mining prices are based.

In accordance therewith, the representatives of the various competitive districts met at the Chittenden Hotel, Columbus, Ohio, March 8, and agreed upon the following scale of wages and conditions to govern all inside day labor for the year begining April 1, next, and ending April 1, 1899.

INSIDE DAY WAGE SCALE.

Tracklayers	$1.90
Tracklayers' Helpers	1.75
Trappers	.75
Bottom Cagers	1.75
Drivers	1.75
Trip Riders	1.75
Water Haulers	1.75
Timbermen, where such are employed	1.90
Pipemen, for compressed air plants	1.85
Company men in Long Wall Mines of Third Vein District, Northern Illinois	1.75
All Other Inside Day Labor	1.75

The above scale was arrived at by taking the average of the wages paid in all of the competitive districts and reducing said average to an eight-hour day, then adding the advance to said average to correspond with the advance in price of mining to be paid April 1 next.

RESOLUTION I.

The above schedule of day wages applies only to men employed in the performance of their labor, and does not apply to boys unless they can do and are employed to do a man's work.

RESOLUTION II.

Whereas, We have failed to agree upon a uniform rate of wages for the different classes of outside labor for the entire competitive field, owing to the variations of conditions over which we have no control;

Resolved, That the employing of outside day laborers around the mine, and wages to be paid the same, shall be left entirely to the employers and such employes in all the competitive districts, and the question of uniform wages for outside labor be referred to our next Interstate Joint Convention.

Resolved, That where any members of the present force of outside day labor in the competitive field prefer to work in the mine in preference to accepting the wages offered for their services as outside day laborers, they shall be given places in the mine to mine coal.

RESOLUTION III.

Resolved, That an eight-hour day means eight hours' work in the mine at usual working places for all classes of inside day labor. This shall be exclusive of the time required in reaching such working places in the morning and departing from same at night.

Regarding drivers, they shall take their mules to and from the stables, and the time required in so doing shall not include any part of the day's labor, their work beginning when they reach the change at which they receive empty cars, but in no case shall the driver's time be docked while he is waiting for such cars at the point named.

RESOLUTION IV.

Resolved, That when the men go into the mine in the morning they shall be entitled to two hours' pay whether or not the mine works the full two hours. But after the first two hours the men shall be paid for every hour thereafter by the hour, for each hour's work or fractional part thereof. If for any reason the regular routine work cannot be furnished the inside labor for a portion of the first two hours, the operators may furnish other than regular labor for the unexpired time.

The above was agreed to after the most careful discussion of each item, and we believe it to be the best and most equitable solution of the questons involved, taking into consideration the various interests to be harmonized in order to reach a uniform scale.

It is expected that all the prices and conditions shall be strictly adhered to by both operators and miners.

(233) "Francis Feehan. There is no one more pleased than I that the interstate joint convention has been re-established, and that we are assembled to at least make an effort to negotiate a wage scale. This has been brought about after months of effort on the part of the mine workers' organization."

(234) "H. L. Chapman, of Ohio: Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen—In making this motion on behalf of the operators for this length of time for this contract, I do not know that I can emphasize our reasons for making it more than I have done in the past. But the operators of the three states feel that they would not be justified in the present conditions that prevail in the coal trade throughout this competitive field, and with the outlook for the present year of the business, they do not feel that they could be justified in making an agreement for one year, but they are hopeful that the conditions of the country will change from what they now are and have been for the last four or five months, during the year following this year. Presidential election coming on this year, and whatever may take place as a result of that, it matters not whether one side is successful or not, we hope that such a condition will prevail in the business affairs of the country that it will be settled, and that there will be a revival of the conditions of business that the operators of the competitive field would have a fairly remunerative business for the last year of the contract if it was made until the date that I have named. I do not believe that there is an operator today in this competitive field that is producing coal that believes that there is a show for the year 1908 and a part of 1909, the time that this contract, if only made for one year, would run, and they cannot hope to more than break even in their business for this year on the present prices. And you gentlemen know just as well as the operators know that in the non-union fields that in the place of paying the present wages, or the wages that have been paid in this field in the past two years, reductions have taken place already, and more reductions will probably take place. And the operators of this competitive field who are acting with you want to continue and act with you people, and you cannot expect but what they have got to meet this competition that comes from that source during the year, because with the restricted trade that is necessarily going to exist the efforts that are being made by those in the non-competitive fields are marvelous to secure the trade that the organized sections have heretofore had, and they are being successful already in many instances.

"Now in brief, gentlemen, these are the reasons why the operators of the competitive field of Western Pennsylvania and Ohio and Indiana feel that they cannot do otherwise than make that contract to extend for the period that I have named. In all justice to you people and to ourselves we believe from our standpoint that it is to the interest of both of us that it should be maintained. You are now receiving the highest price that has ever been paid for any considerable time in the bituminous coal field, and

p. 52, l. 10–47.

(235) John H. Jones, of Pennsylvania: "You want to point your guns at your enemies. You want to point your guns at the operators who in the past have not proved by their actions that they are friends of yours or of organized labor. This is the thing you should do in the next two years. Do not point them at your friends; turn them on the men who are not your friends.

"At the present time there is coal being mined in non-union districts, and it is encroaching upon our markets; even in places where they have differences between them they are dropping them and taking away the contracts from the union fields. The question has been asked, why haven't we had this state of affairs during the past two years? The reason is, we have had very prosperous times, and there was plenty of trade for all. This is not the case at the present time; and if the operators mining in non-union fields in this district can maintain their present position, i. e., have their coal mined at ten cents to twenty cents per ton less than operators employing union labor, and are enabled to market their coal at the prices at which they are marketing it, it is going to place both operators and miners in a very embarrassing position in the very near future.

"In the Pittsburg district, which is the greatest industrial center in the world, the largest number of operators who are mining coal with non-union miners have already forced a reduction of from ten to twelve per cent. Now you should make a settlement for two years and turn your guns where they belong."

p. 58, l. 18–43.

(236) Francis Feehan, of Pennsylvania: "Now I have very little to say in reply to Mr. Jones of the Pittsburg district. I am very desirous of lending all of my efforts to prevent, if possible, the production of non-union coal. I know that it has been my policy as an officer of the organization to try if possible and agree along with the operators who have entered into a contract with us and are dealing as business men should do, and if I had any fighting to do I would want to fight the fellow that was unfair and who was taking advantage. We feel that this should be done. However, it is well for me to remind some of the Pittsburg operators at this time that our guns were kept very warm in the Pittsburg district trying to force some of them to live up to their contract, which they had entered into without devoting any of our time and attention to the non-union business."

p. 59, l. 45–50.
p. 60, l. 1–8.

(237) "President Lewis: All of the membership of the organization of miners of this country gave these instructions. If it were only a question of the three states we could settle it right here in this convention, but not being a question of the three states it will go to the entire membership with these recommendations."

p. 63, l. 15–20.

(238) "H. L. Chapman, of Ohio: Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen: Speaking for myself and the Ohio interests, this question of stopping the mines upon a little local difficulty and causing them to become idle, whether it is the fault of the miners, or the fault of the operators, or rather the mine bosses, or some one else, there ought to be some way in the interest of both sides that could prevent this. I agree with Mr. Lewis in his statement that at times there are men at fault who have charge of the mines, as well as the miners sometimes. I have no case of that kind myself; but the company I represent in the Hocking Valley, that the time we were not at work on June 23, 1906, to December 3, 1907, taking all of the stoppages at our mines, and counting them as if they were at one mine, and counting the hours and the days and everything of that kind over these trivial differences that in my judgment no man or mine ought to have stopped at all, the difficulty ought to have been adjusted in a businesslike, sensible way between the operators and the representatives of the miners, according to the statement that I have, all of mines put together which would be for one hundred and seventy-six days.

"G. W. Savage, of Ohio: Enumerate the causes.

"H. L. Chapman, of Ohio: There were scores of causes; and I could not give them without having the paper on which I have it. They were questions of local character pertaining to the mines; but I know that it foots up to one hundred and seventy-six days. It seems that the fault in some of the cases was with the company, and in other cases the fault was with the miners; but it don't make any difference whose fault it was, the fact remains that the miners were stopped. In these mines taking them all together, I figured at them a little while today, and I found that these mines stopped over two hundred men, and maybe more than that, and they were probably getting about $2.55 per day, as the average earning power of the men during that time, and this would amount to $80,000.00 that the miners of the Sunday Creek Company lost during that period over what they would have had if they would have continued at work.

"Mr. Sullivan: Did you lose any contracts, Mr. Chapman?

"H. L. Chapman, of Ohio: I am not talking about that. On the other hand, the mines lost, for it undoubtedly lost to the company whatever profit they might have made on the coal that they would have produced during that period of time if it had been put into the market; this in addition to all of the men who were employed to take care of the property, and the monthly salaries of other men. Putting the profit on the coal that would have been dug from the mines in that period at fifteen cents a ton lump coal, then it undoubtedly cost the company thirty thousand dollars during that period."

p. 69, l. 1–25.

(239) P. H. Penna, of Indiana: "And then I want to add that there are unorganized fields in this country today that could be named that have cost you people hundreds of thousands of dollars, and lots of work, and pretty near cost the hide of some of my friends; there are cases in that shape."

p. 73, l. 44–48.

(240) "President Lewis: Before this report is voted on I have a resolution which ought to be read, and I will read it with your permission.

"Whereas, We, the representatives, of the operators and miners of Western Pennsylvania, Ohio and Indiana, believe that the Illinois operators and miners should be a part of the Central Competitive Field Joint Movement:

"Resolved, That we, the operators and miners in this joint convention, extend to the operators and miners of Illinois an urgent and cordial invitation to join with us in the next interstate joint movement in the next joint convention in February, 1910.

"I move its adoption.

"Chairman Zerbe: It has been moved that we adopt the resolution just read by President Lewis.

"P. H. Penna: The Illinois operators and miners are in joint convention in Springfield at this time, attempting to make a scale, and I think it would be a graceful thing to do if Mr. Lewis would endorse it; that in addition to the resolution he has prepared that our President and Secretary be instructed to forward that resolution to their meeting in Springfield, together with the congratulations of this joint convention and the expressed hope that they may be able to reach an amicable settlement.

"President Lewis: If Mr. Penna will make that as an amendment to my motion, I will accept it.

"P. H. Penna, of Indiana: I offer it as an amendment to be added to the motion of Mr. Lewis.

"Mr. Kelly, of Illinois: I believe we have a right to be heard in this matter yet. We from Illinois are not here today asking for anything except that which we believe we are entitled to, and I want to say to you that we have a few things that we are entitled to at this time. The President of the National organization has expressed the absolute views of the Illinois miners, and we have no desire to contradict any report that he has made. I do want to say for the Illinois miners one thing, and I would be doing myself an injustice if I failed to do this. This man has come here and made this same speech in every convention that we have had for the past ten years, and—

"Chairman Zerbe: The gentleman is out of order.

"Mr. Kelly of Illinois. I believe we have as much right to the floor as Mr. Chapman, and with all due respects to his views we have a right to come here nevertheless, and we are asking you now if you are going to leave us here to fight our battles through in making local agreements? I have this to say to you gentlemen, and that is all I have to say—I appeal to you now because of the fact that there are more of you than there are from Illinois. I do appeal to you now and ask you to hold up your hands in this attempt to re-establish and bring about what Tom Lewis calls the Interstate Joint Movement. If it is not possible for him to bring the Illinois operators and miners into this joint conference, when in God's name can you bring them in?

"I want to go further and call attention to the statement made not over sixteen days ago, when he said that the Ohio operators had something like three million tons of coal they wanted to sell, and then they would make an agreement with us and not until then. I said the other day on the floor of this convention that there was a collusion between the operators of the three states, and I want to repeat it now, notwithstanding my friend Penna wants to deny it."

p. 108, l. 1–30.

(241) "Chairman Zerbe: Now the question before the house is on the motion of Mr. Lewis, amended by Mr. Penna, in regard to the message to be sent to Illinois. That is not debatable. All in favor of this resolution will signify it by saying 'Aye.'

p. 110, l. 20–24.

(242) "President Lewis: Several delegates have asked me, and I want to explain the discussion on this question of the referendum vote. It will not be just the districts represented here, but will be a vote of the entire membership."

Readopted to govern Joint Interstate Convention of 1908.

p. 16, l. 36–39.

(245) "Mr. John Mitchell: I move to amend the report of the Committee on Credentials by inserting the following: That the miners and operators of the states of Kansas, Missouri, Arkansas, Texas and Indian Territory be admitted to the joint conference and granted the same privileges accorded to operators and miners from the States composing the Central Competitive Coal Field. (Seconded.)

"Mr. Robbins: Until the report of Committee on Credentials is adopted there can be no convention. The call for the convention was for the representatives of the operators and miners from the four states of Illinois, Indiana, Ohio and Pennsylvania. The report brought in establishes this convention members of those four states on the part of the operators and miners. I submit that until that is acted upon anything else is out of order.

"Mr. Mitchell: I think that the point of order should not be sustained, for the reason that the Joint Convention of miners and operators is a continuous body. There is no final dissolution of our sessions at the end of our conventions each year. We adjourn to meet a year from the date of the convention then closing. Consequently the organization of this convention does not mean the organization of a new convention. This is a continuation of a convention held two years ago, and it seems to me it is perfectly in order to extend the scope of our work to invite to participate with us in this convention the representatives of the operators and miners of other districts. I therefore believe the motion is not out of order.

"Mr. W. S. Bogle: Mr. Mitchell has made the strongest argument possible in favor of the report of the Credentials Committee. The original call that inaugurated this movement included these four states, and the call since that time has not been changed. Therefore no credentials committee can consider the credentials of any states or districts outside of the call. It is perfectly outside of the province of a credentials committee to take cognizance of credentials from a body of men who were not included in the call. I will admit that it is a part and parcel of the convention to take up and consider whether or not it will enlarge its scope and take in additional territory. That is a matter that may properly come before this convention at any time; but to attempt to put it into the report of the Credentials Committee is absurd. Mr. Mitchell himself has given the best argument against it. I will ask the secretary to read the original call for the convention in Chicago and at the same time the call for this convention. No Credentials Committee can go outside of the call. I have been informed that the original call included West Virginia. The operators at all times have been willing to welcome West Virginia.

"Mr. Mitchell: Why don't you bring the operators from West Virginia here?

"Mr. Bogle: Why don't you bring them? If it was not for the check-off system granted you by the operators of these four states your organization would not last two years. We are giving your organization its strength here today. It is not you; it is not these delegates; it is the gentlemen seated on this side of the hall that are making your organization what it is.

"Chairman Traer: Mr. Bogle, the motion is in regard to the admission of other States.

"Mr. Chris Evans: Mr. Bogle made the statement that he understood the original call included West Virginia. For the information of this convention I wish to state that the original call included all the States and territories. At the convention that adopted the first scale of prices, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois and West Virginia were all represented. The original call, however, included all the states and territories. I make this statement because I sent out the first circular for such a convention.

"Mr. Bogle: I would like to have the secretary read the original call for the Chicago convention of 1898. Mr. Evans is confusing the record; he is going back to some ancient history, to some other movement that died a natural death and was revived in 1897, followed by a convention that met in 1898. If there is any question about that I would like to have read the call for this convention.

"Chairman Traer: Mr. Lewis has asked for the floor. The chair will recognize Mr. Lewis if he will postpone his argument until the secretary has read the call for this convention.

"Secretary W. B. Wilson read the following:

" 'Further, in pursuance of the authority vested in us, we hereby call a Joint Convention of the coal operators and miners of Western Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana and Illinois to meet at Indianapolis, Indiana, at 10 o'clock a. m., January 25, 1906.'

"Mr. Bogle: I renew my point of order. The Committee on Credentials, in making its report, can take cognizance of no other credentials than from the operators and miners included in the call. I will ask the ruling of the chair on that point.

"Chairman Traer: A point of order has been raised upon which it will be necessary for the chair to rule before discussion is in order. The Interstate Agreement for the two years beginning April 1, 1904, and ending March 31, 1906, provides, in addition to the various numbered articles which it contains, the clause which has just been read by the secretary.

"Gentlemen, the agreement upon which this meeting was called leaves the chair no option as to the decision as to who the preliminary members and as to who the members entitled to participation in the organization of this convention shall be. Plainly, from the agreement which has just been read, the original organization of this convention contemplates the admission only of the members from the operators and miners of the States mentioned in this agreement. If it is desired by either the operators or the miners of either or all of the states to introduce into this organization additional members, that is a matter which should be brought up and passed upon the same as any other matter, submitted to this convention. The chair has no option but to rule that upon the report of the Credentials Committee the point of order is well taken. The organization of this convention must be based upon the agreement under which it was called.

"The motion is upon the adoption of the report of the Credentials Committee.

"Mr. T. L. Lewis, Ohio: I would like to ask a question of the chair.

"Chairman Traer: Proceed, Mr. Lewis.

"Mr. Lewis: According to the ruling of the chair this convention must first pass upon the report of the Committee on Credentials with reference to the four States.

"Chairman Traer: That is correct, Mr. Lewis.

"Mr. Lewis: And the admission of any other state is to be an after consideration? Is that correct?

"Chairman Traer: That is correct. The motion is upon the adoption of the report of the Credentials Committee. The secretary will call the roll.

"(Secretary Wilson called the roll of the States. All the operators voted in the affirmative; all the miners voted in the affirmative.)

"Chairman Traer: The vote is unanimous, and the report of the Credentials Committee is adopted.

"Mr. Mitchell: I now renew my motion not as an amendment, but as a motion. I move that the miners and operators of the States of Kansas, Missouri, Arkansas, Texas and Indian Territory be admitted to the joint conference and granted the same privileges accorded to the operators and miners from the States comprising the Central Competitive Coal Field. (Seconded by Secretary Wilson.)

"Mr. Mitchell: In support of this motion I wish to make a few remarks. This is not the first time that the operators and miners of the Central Competitive Coal Field have departed from the rule which limits participation in this conference to the four districts which have been accorded representation here. A few years ago the operators and miners of Central Pennsylvania came to Indianapolis, made application for a seat in our joint conference, and were accorded that right. Mr. Robinson, of the Buffalo, Rochester & Pittsburg Coal Company, of Central Pennsylvania, was not only admitted to the conference, but served for a short time on the Scale Committee. So that in asking that the scope of our work be extended so as to include the miners and operators of the Southwestern States we are establishing no new precedent. But, aside from that it seems to me that it would be to our mutual advantage if we can bring into this conference the representative operators and miners of not only the Southwestern states, but the operators and miners of every coal-producing State in the Union.

"These States west of the Mississippi River—and I want to speak particularly of Iowa—are competitive with coal produced in the States east of the Mississippi River. Coal mined in Pennsylvania, in Ohio, in Indiana and in Illinois is sold in the same market as the coal produced in all of these states seeking admission here. There can be no doubt in the minds of either operators or miners that it is desirable to establish a wage scale that will be practically the same in every State and in every territory where coal is mined and sold in a common market. And it seems to me that incalculable benefit will accrue to the coal industry if we can bring into closer affiliation and harmonius co-operation at least the men who own the mines of these various States, to say nothing of the benefits that will come from bringing into co-operation the men who work in the mines. The trouble too often has been that you gentlemen have not worked in harmony one with the other, and too often we have had to suffer because of friction among the men who employ us. I trust, Mr. Chairman, that the proposition to include these Southwestern States, whose operators and miners are here, will be adopted, and that we shall hereafter invite to meet us the miners and operators of every State where the men are organized and where coal is mined and meets your product in competition."

p. 5, l. 7–66.
p. 7, l. 1–18.

(246) "Mr. H. L. Chapman: It has been now twenty years since I started out with John McBryde and Chris Evans, both of whom are here, I believe, although many of the others have passed over the river, to attempt to organize, carry on and perpetuate the Interstate Agreement for the benefit of the operators and miners of the four competitive States. We have met here this year, after a two years' recess, for the purpose of again seeing if we can, in this competitive field, establish and retain the present relations that have existed between us for so many years. Each of you operators and each of you miners who have participated in these conventions know full well the difficulties that have attended this movement. On several occasions it has well nigh gone. It has required the patience, the conservatism and the arguments of the level-headed operators and miners to perpetuate it. It will require the same in the future to perpetuate it. As you all know, it has been demonstrated in the past that whenever you add another State to the movement it makes it that much more difficult for the four States to get an agreement. While I have been connected with the movement for a great many years, I am today not familiar with all the conditions even in my own state, nor am I familiar with all the conditions in Pennsylvania, Illinois or Indiana; much less do I know the conditions that exist in any of these outlying districts. What does an Ohio operator or an Ohio miner, except those who have been in those outlying districts, know concerning the matters there? What business have we to attempt to fix a scale of wages for men a thousand miles away from us, and for operators a thousand miles away from us? The conditions are entirely different; the markets are entirely different. We in Ohio do not come into competition to any extent with any of the districts named. If the miners would bring in our sister States of Virginia and West Virginia, we would admit them. We have tried to bring in the operators, but have failed. Let us look at the conditions there. In 1903 the State of West Virginia produced 26,882,000 tons of coal; in 1904, 30,222,000 tons, and the estimated production for 1905 is 35,000,000 tons. In Ohio in 1903 we produced 24,573,000 tons; in 1904, we produced 24,583,000 tons, an increase of 10,000 tons in one year. Although the statistics for 1905 are not yet out, I do not think Ohio will show an increase of anything in 1905. What does this argue? That this State of West Virginia is taking away steadily the trade of the miners and operators in Ohio. Our people undoubtedly would be in better condition today, so far as the operators are concerned, if they had a free rein against West Virginia, with the cheap labor they have over there, but we do not want it. We want the conditions of our people in our State to be just as good as we can make them, and we are willing to stand by the movement, and trust in the future that something may occur to bring those people in, or to prevent their taking away any more of our trade.

"You miners want to consider this proposition carefully and seriously. Consider whether or not you are not, by increasing this territory, bringing about a condition of things that will eventually ruin the movement that has done so much for all in the competitive field. These people in the Southwest that you are seeking to take in have an organization with which you meet and fix a scale. You have your organization there. We have no objection to it. We say God-speed in your movement in the Southwest, but do not make this thing so big and difficult to handle that you destroy it. That is what the operators fear, to say nothing about the business proposition connected with it. These gentlemen have no right to come in here, and we have no right to let them in. We are a close corporation so far as these four States are concerned, between the miners and operators. Unless you can demonstrate by different arguments from those you have presented on this and on former occasions, that there is something in it, we will continue to object to the admission of those States. As Mr. Robbins has said, our convention has voted against the proposition today as a solid wall. In the interest of the men that are laboring for us in the competitive field, we refuse to let these districts in. It seems strange to me that this question should be brought in year after year. It was threshed out years ago. The same arguments have been used year after year by the miners and the operators. We have not changed in any respect. I do not question your sincerity in the least; you cannot question the sincerity of the operators from their side. I think that is all I desire to say at the present on this proposition."

p. 11, l. 1–40.

(247) "I may be an idealist or a dreamer, but I hope to see the day when every coal-producing field in the United States will participate in this joint conference."

Mr. Green.
p. 12, l. 40–42.

(248) "The gentleman on the other side spoke of what we are doing in West Virginia. I desire to answer that question by stating that we have men in that State trying to organize the miners. While doing so we meet with opposition from people who claim they are law-abiding citizens, who claim that they respect the law, and they respect it to the extent that they hire thugs to assault the men we put in there to organize that field."

Mr. Lewis.
p. 19, l. 14–19.

(249) "Mr. Mitchell and Mr. Lewis make the great mistake of always talking as though the organization controlled all the coal mined in this country, when, as a matter of fact, you do not control it, and there is where the increase and the low prices are coming from, and that is what we are meeting."

Mr. Robbins.
p. 25, l. 57–60.

(250) "I might say, while I am on my feet, in reply to one statement made here, that the miners' representatives discussed these questions on the assumption that we control all of the coal mines in the country, that I have never attempted to discuss these questions from that standpoint. I know we do not control all of the mines in the country, or at least we have not in the past; but we are in better position now in case we fail to agree, to control the mining industry of this country than we have ever been before."

Mr. Lewis.
p. 27, l. 50–56

(251) "Mr. Dolan: Haven't you the power to discharge a man over in Ohio if he does what is wrong, or if he does that which is not for the best interests of the company?

"Mr. Chapman: I question that proposition.

"Mr. Dolan: Then it is up to the officials of that district to see whether or not a man who loads dirty coal cannot be discharged. I know they discharge them in the Pittsburgh District if they do wrong.

"Mr. Haskins: Whenever men do anything wrong, of course they are discharged. A superintendent, while he is angry, of course, does not decide the question. Any man who does wrong in Ohio is discharged, but it isn't all one-sided. The man has a hearing."

p. 38, l. 32–42.

(252) "Mr. Dolan: I don't agree with the way Mr. Haskins answered my question when I asked if the operators of Ohio had the power to discharge a man if he did wrong. He said the men there had a hearing. The men in the Pittsburgh District get a hearing, but we have sense enough in Pittsburgh to let a man go when we know he has done wrong.

"Mr. Haskins: I will say for Ohio that we have as much discretion as they have in Pittsburgh. I answered the question as well as I knew how. I meant that in Ohio when the operators desired to discharge a man the matter is taken up with our people. We will not, as a general proposition, permit operators to indiscriminately discharge our men, and if they do so, we will strike for that as quickly as we will for 10 cents a ton."

p. 39, l. 40–50.

(253) "Mr. Mitchell: I never, either officially or personally, said to Mr. Schleuderberg or anyone else that I was not in favor of a uniform scale for outside labor. If I have been one thing I have been consistent in a demand for a uniform scale for outside day labor; so much so, so much concerned have I been about the outside day men, that I went to Pittsburgh to attend two different meetings, and served notice on the Pittsburgh operators that I would stop every mine in the Pittsburgh District if I had to fill the mines with organizers, in order to get a 20 per cent advance for outside day labor."

p. 58, l. 49–56.

(254) "Mr. Penna: I don't see why the miners should inject such a proposition into this meeting. The eight-hour day was conceded in the Chicago convention, and it has never been enforced by you people. You have never kept your contract in that particular. The keeping of your contract has been the exception; the violating of it the rule. A minority of the miners work the eight-hour day, and you have not done anything to enforce the eight-hour day at all. Your treatment of the eight-hour day has been such as to endanger it and make it repulsive to men who opposed it at that time and predicted just what would come of it. The advocates of the eight-hour day in Chicago were confronted with prophecies as to how it would be enforced. It has been demonstrated that those prophecies were true. We are surrounded by men working nine and ten hours a day, and the coal they produce competes with ours. Before you have made that proposition of the eight-hour day an established fact you want to shorten the hours. If conditions are not bettered it will only be a question of opportunity before you lose the eight-hour day. You are not making converts to the eight-hour day proposition, and to come in here and try to enforce a seven-hour day I think is very poor policy, and comes with poor grace from you gentlemen. Every attempt has been made to destroy the eight-hour day in a local way. The first thing the Indiana miners did, after coming from the Chicago convention, was to declare that under no circumstances would a miner go into a coal mine on an idle day. They had no right to do it; the contract did not prohibit them doing so. The contract had been made on the same basis that other contracts had, and such a change would embarrass the operators. In a subsequent year we were able to get a clause making it compulsory upon them to go in and timber their places if it was made necessary by shooting at the quitting time the night before. This same restrictive policy, the same meddlesome interference is what brings the eight-hour day into disrepute. A machine man is allowed to work in the mine eight hours a day, and if for any reason he stays out and the loaders after a machine have to go home, the next day that man is not allowed to go in and do cutting so his loaders will have work on the following day. The whole tendency of our people has been to restrict and restrict, cut down and establish themselves as watchmen to see how little could be done and how many restrictions could be made to prevent work. If we have a scale made in this convention we ought to have something to say about that eight-hour day. We want it arranged so that there will be no dispute about it between operators and miners anywhere when we leave here. We believe the consent of this side of the house to require the miners to work eight hours per day or forty-eight hours per week does carry with it an obligation on the part of the miner to work that forty-eight hours when the work is provided. If that is not the case, then the operators have not taken advantage of their rights to work more than forty-eight hours without any consideration. When we agree not to ask the miners to work more than forty-eight hours in a week they ought to be willing to work that many hours, and if for any reason they do not work one day they ought not to be prevented from working the following day, even though the mine is idle, when their absence is going to decrease the output of the mine."

p. 63, l. 20–65.

(255) "Mr. J. H. Walker: I offered a substitute, providing for six hours a day and five days a week. I am satisfied if this movement is going to continue it will come to that some time. I want it understood that I agree with Mr. Robbins that I don't want to enter into any agreement with the operators to defraud the public. There is one question that is a bone of contention, and we can trace every argument of the operators to it. I refer to the competition from the unorganized fields. I don't care whether it is the eight-hour work day, the mine-run system, the day wage scale or the tonnage rates, we find in every argument made by the operators this competition from the unorganized fields as the main factor. Now, that question has got to be met. In my opinion the amount of coal that is produced, and the method by which it is produced in the organized fields, is the one thing that we are going to have to handle in order to be able to meet competition from unorganized fields. We have two methods of meeting it. One is to agree with the operators in their contentions along these lines, taking as a basis for the present contract, prices, rates and conditions, which will allow them to compete with the coal coming from the fields where the men are unorganized. You know what that means. You know if there was a reduction in wages here now, as there was two years ago, that would not insure you from competition from those fields. Just as soon as they could do so they would rearrange their prices in order to be in the same relative position they were before. No matter how much you would increase the hours of labor in the organized fields, thereby indirectly lowering the cost of your coal, it would only be a short time until their conditions would be rearranged and they would be ready to meet you on the same old basis. There is another way. Recognize the amount of coal you have got to meet in competition and handle the output in the organized fields in such a way that the best results will follow. Then we must try the best methods for getting those fields into the organization. The miners and operators must go in partnership to the extent of entering into a mutual arrangement—you may call it a conspiracy, but I don't believe it is, and I don't believe the people of this country would consider it as much an injury for the operators and miners of the bituminous fields to get together and agree on what would be a fair living wage for every man dependent upon that industry, at the same time allow the operators a fair return on their investment, as they would if you gave us the conditions now in force in the unorganized fields. I think we should simply restrict, or by some method control, the entire output from the organized fields in such a way that you will be able to pay us a living wage, allow us to work under decent conditions and get a fair return on their investment. The only way to do that is to have control of the output and put it in such a condition that you can get the prices necessary to enable you to do this.

"I think if you were to enter into a contract for a six-hour work day, and work five days a week, and use that as a basis for your present contract, if you work together, instead of going into cut-throat competition, you will get the best results for everybody concerned. I think in this way you can get the results you are now seeking for, and they would be secured at a less cost to you and less labor for us. I think it will also bring about an organization in the unorganized fields. I am satisfied this can be done, and whether you do it now or not, later on in this movement it will have to be done in order to get what we should get out of this industry.

"Mr. Taylor: Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen: The remedy Dr. Walker has prescribed for the coal trade might have some worth if all the coal that it was possible to develop was at present developed, and all the capital that could be invested in the coal industry was invested. If we were to follow his suggestion and restrict our business to the hours and days mentioned, if we were to curtail the output of our mines in that way, inviting the competition of this vast territory of undeveloped coal and the large supply of uninvested capital we would have an oversupply that would wipe us out of existence.

"Now, gentlemen, let us go back to the eight-hour day. We have suffered under the eight-hour day as much as any other State. We haven't the eight-hour day in Illinois. I am not saying that a large number of men do not live up to their contract in regard to the eight-hour day to the best of their ability; but the operators in the State of Illinois, when they want coal, cannot get eight hours' labor from their men, and especially since the shot firers' law has been in force. This morning in our own conference one of our large operators showed from carefully kept records that out of 285 men who went down in the mines in the morning, an average of only 160 were hoisted out, showing that 125 men came out during the working hours.

Give us a fair competitive wage scale and work eight hours a day and we will look after competition.

"Mr. Mitchell: I would suggest that Mr. Walker's remarks on competitive prices be eliminated from the record.

"Mr. Robbins: I object. I want those remarks to go into the record.

"Mr. Mitchell: Mr. Walker, in offering the suggestions he did, did not reflect the desires of the United Mine Workers of America. The United Mine Workers of America have no intention or desire to enter into an arrangement with the operators that will control the selling prices of the coal to the detriment of the general public, for whom we are very solicitous.

"Mr. Lewis: If there are any objections to eliminating that part of the record, I want to say, as one representative of the mine workers' organization, we won't agree at any time to enter into a partnership with the operators to raise the price of coal in this country.

"Mr. Robbins: I want to say, Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the operators, that they have never asked the miners to join with them to make any agreement to put up the price of coal, or to put any unfair conditions on the public in any manner."

p. 67, l. 12–66.
p. 68, l. 1–29.

(256) "Mr. J. H. Walker: I should like to have a correction to go in following my statement. I want to disabuse the minds of the gentlemen present of the impression they appear to have received, that I want to enter into an agreement with the operators to raise the prices of coal to the public. I did not intend to convey any such impression. The impression I did want to convey was that you should enter into an arrangement that would enable you to pay us living wages, that would permit us to live under decent conditions, and at the same time to give you a fair return on the money invested in your property."

p. 69, l. 61–66.
p. 70, l. 1, 2.

(257) "Lately we had the mine idle because the local established a rule that the cars were to be above the tipple the night before at 8 o'clock. This is the sort of thing that is in vogue throughout the Linton District, and has been for a long time. The officials of the organization will come there and have the locals strike those things off the books. I believe the officials do the very best they can in this respect, but there is no penalty attached for doing such things, and no one suffers except the man who is running the mine. We lost three straight days in the last instance, and I don't suppose it will be two months before we will have to do it all over again. The local passes some rule, the men come out in the morning and the mine stops. After two or three days' fussing we get the mine started, but that does not help the interference with our trade."

Mr. Siefert.
p. 70, l. 15–26.

(258) "The question of the cars not being above the tipple at starting time has been up in Ohio at different times, but we did not care to bring it in here."

p. 70, l. 59–61.

(259) "Mr. Moorshead: In many locals in the State of Illinois they have an arrangement by which if there is less than a half-day's run of cars when they reach the mine they go home. In many cases where a train has just pulled by and has gone to push the empties in from the sidetrack, because the cars were not actually there on the track ready for loading, the men have gone home. Should we pay for the two hours in a case of that kind?

"Mr. Perry: Not if the men go home. If men draw the line so close as that they are not living up to the spirit of our agreement and I don't believe the officials of the State of Illinois would back them up in any such thing.

"Mr. Moorshead: I am glad to hear that.

"Mr. Ogle: I am glad to hear that said. They go a good deal farther than that in Indiana.

"Chairman Ryan: Indiana must be an awful place.

"Mr. Ogle: It is a good place. We are not only required to have the flats there in the morning, but we are required to have them there the night before. Even when they are on the part of the switch below the tipple, though they may have been there for hours, the men will not work. In case the whistle blows for work they go so far as to punish the operator by refusing to work the next day, or any other day, until there is a full day's run of cars above the tipple the preceding night. I am glad to hear Mr. Perry say what he does.

"Mr. Mitchell: Is not that a local arrangement? Is it not made by agreement with the operators?

"Mr. Ogle: No, sir.

"Mr. Mitchell: It is by agreement with the operators that the companies have not a right to blow the whistle the night before for the men to go to work in the morning unless there is a certain number of cars at the mine at 8 o'clock at night.

"Mr. Ogle: Several years ago at one mine such an arrangement was made, and the miners have systematically tried to force it on every other mine in the State. They have had a great deal of success. This solicitude for the day men is really quite unnecessary. In our district when the machine man comes to work and wants to work, or if it is absolutely necessary for him to cut his coal so the men may work next day, he is forbidden to do so."

p. 77, l. 30–62.

(260) "Mr. Taylor: Before the Illinois coal operators will vote on an advance in the present price, or on any other price for the coming year, they desire to have incorporated in any agreement that could be made or is made by this convention the following:

" 'That the mining rate shall include the mining, shooting and loading of the coal, and timbering of the working; place; and, that where shot firers are employed, the miners shall reimburse the operator for the entire expense occasioned thereby. That in machine mines it shall include the proper snubbing of the coal.

" 'That this scale is based upon existing mining laws, and in case new laws are enacted, increasing or decreasing the operating cost of producing coal, the contract scale rates affected thereby shall be increased or decreased to compensate therefor.

" 'That the scale shall embody specific provisions for suspending the check-off in case of suspension of work in violation of contracts, and providing for adequate compensation to the operator for loss occasioned thereby, the same to be paid by the miners' local offending and to be insured by the retention of a suitable portion of the union dues collected."

p. 82, l. 32–49.

(261) "Mr. Taylor: In making this demand the Illinois operators do so from the fact that when we made our contract two years ago we thought we knew what our coal was going to cost us. We had a clause in our contract which provided that no demand should be made locally which should increase the cost of our coal. After our miners had made an effort in our convention to have a shot-firers' clause inserted in our contract, and having failed to do so, they appointed a legislative committee to lobby a shot-firers' bill through the Illinois legislature. That committee went before our legislative body, affiliated themselves, as I understand, with a lobby appointed by the Federation of Illinois, and by trading votes in cities for votes in mining districts they carried such weight in the legislature that they carried the law through. It was against all fairness and against the contract they had with us, and imposed upon us a condition which absolutely changed the provisions of our contract. In fact, it changed our contract to such an extent that it was entirely abrogated. We had meetings with the legislature and with different committees of the legislature; we had meetings with committees of our miners; we argued, pleaded and threatened, and finally the law was enacted and we were forced to suspend work in the State. We had no contract to work under, the action of our men having abrogated it. Then the men began to see light, and we got together and eliminated by agreement part of the iniquities they had imposed upon us. The matter of shot firers was left to arbitration. Two miners and two operators were selected, and they selected Judge Gray. He decided that the miners, having contracted to mine, load and shoot coal and take care of the working places were bound to do it. He further ruled that the inspection of the shots was not part of the contract, and therefore the operators must bear that additional expense under the police laws of the State. He took the stand that he found that law on the statute books of Illinois. The miners have not denied that they had that law passed. They were proud of it then, but I don't think they are now. Judge Gray's decision will carry until the first of April, but it expires with the present contract. He simply ruled under the contract.

"Now, the operators of Illinois do not intend to agree upon anything in this Interstate Agreement that will send us back to our own State with a condition confronting us which will absolutely change every condition of mining in our State and throw us out of line anywhere from 5 to 10 cents a ton with the other States."

p. 82, l. 52–67.
p. 83, l. 1–20.

(262) "We will not agree to a settlement on the basis of the prices we now receive for our labor. We expect to receive an advance in wages, and we will not vote in this committee for a settlement except on a basis of an advance in wages. We did not require from 9 o'clock this morning to 4 o'clock this afternoon to make up our minds. Our minds and our policy is irrevocably made up. There will be no settlement by agreement except upon a basis of an advance in wages."

Mr. Mitchell.
p. 91, l. 50–56.

(263) "Mr. Mitchell: I want to approach this subject with an entire realization of what it means to me personally; because after all, every man in this world feels personally how things will affect him. I believe there is not one man in this meeting, either miner or operator, whom a disagreement will affect more personally than it will affect me. I trust you will pardon me for discussing this from a personal standpoint, but I think I have done as much to build up a relationship between the miners and the operators that has been mutually advantageous as any man in America. But I want to emphasize this one point: If this is the end, if this is Utopia for the coal miners, then this movement means nothing for us. Is there no hope for us? Is the present wage scale the best we can have? Is there no condition of industry that means more for the miners than they now have? I am not willing to agree that the coal miners of this country shall have no more wages, no more favorable conditions of employment than now prevail under our present contract.

"What is the condition of industry? Our entire country is prosperous. The iron trade, railroads, stocks, commerce, everything is at its maximum—and what have we got? A proposition to live under a reduction of wages while every other class of industry is getting an advance in wages. The iron men have been advanced 25 cents a day. Stocks have advanced 100 per cent. I say, gentlemen, it is not fair and it is not equitable to ask us to do it. And, so far as I may by my influence determine the policy of the miners' convention, there will not be a renewal of the present agreement.

"Mr. Robbins: I do not believe that Mr. Mitchell personally or that the United Mine Workers of America can afford to take an arbitrary position in this matter. Through this movement their wages have been increased practically 100 per cent. What under Heaven does Mr. Mitchell mean when he asks if this is all there is in the movement? If you will hold what you have got you will be mighty lucky. What other industry can show such an increase in wages? Your conditions have been improved just as much as your price has been improved. And yet you come in here, when you can show no argument to show that the selling price of coal has been advanced, and ask for an increase in your wages. The selling prices of coal are away below the prices of two years ago. This decline in prices has been borne by the operators. The fields that are in this interstate movement have reached their maximum of tonnage as compared with last year, while the fields that are unorganized are constantly increasing their output. Your day labor is higher today than in any other field. The day labor in the anthracite field is anywhere from 40 to 60 cents a day less, and yet you belittle the movement. As I said in the operators' meeting today, the operators had stood for the movement for humanity's sake, rather than for any personal or financial advantage. Has this been wasted? Has what we have been doing been thrown away? Is it not appreciated by the other side? If it is not, it is time to terminate the movement. And I know of no better position on which the operators can stand before the public, with a depression in their business, with the small, very small, return of profit on their investments, when they offer to continue a rate of wages that is within 5 cents a ton of the highest that has ever been reached. I know of no better position we can take to go before the country than that, and I want, if this movement is broken up, to have it broken up by the miners, on such an unfair proposition as that made by Mr. Mitchell."

p. 93, l. 10–58.

(264) "You miners in Illinois agreed to do a certain amount of work for a certain amount of money and, as I understand it, it has not been denied that you have, after making this agreement, gone to your representatives in the legislature and got them to place a law on the statute books which practically abrogated your agreement and compelled the operators to pay more than you agreed with them to pay."

Mr. Jones.
p. 96, l. 57–63.

(265) "Mr. Chapman: In the remarks I shall make I do not intend to undertake to interfere in any way with the right of any legislature in this country to pass all the police regulations and laws necessary to protect the lives of the miners or the property of the operators. It seems to me, however, that in States where laws are passed that require the operators to pay for something that is provided in the contract the miners shall do, in all future contracts that provision should be eliminated and prices that may be paid the miner for shooting and blowing down the coal should be eliminated entirely from the scale and not become a part of it, if by law the operators are required to perform that duty."

Mr. Chapman.
p. 98, l. 18–27.

(266) "When it comes to a question of competition between Ohio and other fields, we can show by actual figures that the increase in the State of Ohio for the past three years has not kept pace with the increase in other States; in fact, the production has not increased at all. From 1903 to 1904 it increased 10,000 tons, according to the report of the mine inspector. 1905 is not yet tabulated but my information is that the production for the year 1905 will be about a stand-off with the two previous years. Some sections of the State have lost tonnage; other sections have increased some. What has our sister State of West Virginia done in that period? She has gone up at the rate of five to six million tons a year. She is continuing to increase her production and it is only a question of the ability of the operators in that State to get transportation that determines the amount of coal they can get into the market. Two new railroads are now going into that State, one from the seaboard and the other from the North, connecting with all the distributing points in the Northwest. Those roads will scatter that coal, and what State, judging by the figures that are made up in the various Bureaus of Labor statistics, will be most seriously affected? Our State of Ohio is the one; it will be affected in its every field. This coal can be found at almost every station upon every line of railroad that traverses the State of Ohio. It can be found in Indiana, in Chicago, and everywhere. It can be found in Michigan, in Cleveland, and we cannot meet the competition with our present prices. They can and do undersell us, and when I say to you that mine-run coal is produced in the Pocahontas field and put upon the cars at less than 40 cents per ton, including royalties, you will see what chance we have to compete with them. That is probably the best soft coal that goes into the market anywhere. Other mine run coals in West Virginia are put on the cars at 60 cents and 80 cents for lump coal, including royalties and everything, and I ask the miners of Ohio what in the name of conscience we are to do to give you work if the price of our coal is advanced? These are no idle statements, my friends. They go down to the bottom. If the operators are to continue in this line and give you work, how are we to do it if you put such an obligation upon us? If we try to do it we will be required to pay you out of the small savings of the past. We cannot do that; we simply close our properties down and hope for better things in the future. We are willing to continue in this movement, but we are not willing to take our past savings to keep up the pay rolls in Ohio. We are willing, as the limit we feel it possible for us to go, to continue a scale for 1906 upon the very terms and conditions of the past two years, without a single cent added to our cost of production and we will do the best we can to give you work and go along together."

Mr. Chapman.
p. 99, l. 64–67.
p. 100, l. 1–35.

(267) "The operators have not asked the miners to concede any right or to restrict themselves in any privilege before the respective legislative bodies. They can ask for any legislation they desire. Nor do we wish to curtail their rights to do so. We have not asked nor suggested, either directly or indirectly, a reduction in wages as a basis of settlement. The only contention we make is this: You have no right to come here and contract to shoot the coal for a cent a ton, or 2 cents a ton, or 3 cents, and then go and secure an act of the legislature to relieve you of the shooting, but continue to draw money for doing it. You have a right, if you want to, to ask the legislature, after you have made a contract for so much per ton for loading coal, to be relieved of that, but if the operators load it they should be paid for it. We don't attempt to restrict your rights, but we do say if you attempt to do that you ought not to draw the money for it. If it is worth 52 cents in Grape Creek for mine-run coal on the car, which carries with it the digging, loading, securing of the place and the shooting of the coal, then it is worth less than 52 cents a ton when the shooting is eliminated. It would be worth less if the timbering was eliminated, and still less if the loading was eliminated.

"We do not say you have not the right as American citizens to go to the legislature to seek for legislation you believe is for the common good; but we contend when you do that and disturb the competitive relationship established in this convention you have a right to come here and to correct it."

Mr. Penna.
p. 103, l. 4–25.

(268) "The only thing we ask is, when you contract with the operators to do a given piece of work for a stated price, that you will do that work as long as you can, and if at any time the state prohibits you from doing it, that you will refuse to draw the pay. That is honorable."

Mr. Penna.
p. 103, l. 39–42.

(269) "There is no use attempting to draw parallels or to get out of this one fact, you are not doing the work you contracted to do and you are demanding the pay. It does not matter how you construe it, when you come down to the last analysis, that is the fact. You have no more right to draw the proportionate amount of the 52 cents that applies to the shooting of coal, unless you do the shooting, than you have to draw the entire 52 cents if the coal company should do the entire work. I am not saying it is 1 cent, I am not saying it is 5 cents; I don't know to what extent that law in Illinois disturbs the relative basis, but I do know that to whatever extent it does disturb them this institution ought to be big enough to correct it and do Illinois justice."

Mr. Penna.
p. 104, l. 1, 2.

(270) "If there was ever an unlawful combination in this country it was formed in your convention yesterday. Talk about trusts! What trust can compare to the resolution adopted in your convention yesterday? It is simply a threat, a menace to the business interests of this whole country! You have threatened that you will compel an advance by reason of a combination of all the miners of this country, and British Columbia, anthracite and bituminous miners, and compel the people at large to suffer from that combination."

Mr. Robbins.
p. 114, l. 48–54.

(271) "I want to protest further against your methods here yesterday. When this interstate movement was formed the operators and miners of four states met together and in joint conference discussed and settled their difficulties. I object to your change. It is unfair and unbusinesslike, to bring in all the miners of this country and British Columbia, anthracite and bituminous, and ask them to vote upon the propositions of the operators of the States of Indiana, Illinois, Ohio and Pennsylvania. It is a thoroughly unbusinesslike proposition, and it is one we will not submit to. We propose to deal with our miners evenhanded, the same representation on each side. We don't propose to submit our questions to be settled by miners of other States that are competitive and that have absolutely different conditions and different purposes."

Mr. Robbins.
p. 115, l. 4–14.

(272) "You have tied your hands by your resolution which provides that there shall be a settlement in all the districts or in none. One little bit of a dinky mining interest up in Michigan can interfere with the mining interest of the whole country."

Mr. Robbins.
p. 115, l. 20–23.

(273) "So far as our unlawful association is concerned, my reply to that statement is this: We control our own labor and we have a right to sell that labor collectively at the highest price the conditions of this country will warrant us in demanding."

Mr. Lewis.

(275) "INTERSTATE CONVENTION 1906.
(Second Conference)

"Coal Miners and Operators.
Western Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana and Illinois.

Held in Indianapolis, Ind.
March 20th to 29th, 1906.

EXPLANATORY.

"The second joint conference was held pursuant to the suggestion of President Roosevelt, in the following letter addressed to Mr. Francis L. Robbins, of the Pittsburg Coal Company, a similar letter having been addressed to Mr. John Mitchell, President of the United Mine Workers of America:

"'The White House, Washington, February 24, 1906.

"'Sir:—

"'I note with very great concern the failure in your late convention on joint interstate agreement, to come to a basis of settlement of the bituminous mining scale of wages. You, in your business, have enjoyed great industrial peace for many years, thanks to the joint trade agreement that has resulted from the action of your successive conventions.

A strike such as is threatened on April 1st, is a menace to the peace, the business interests and the general welfare of the country. I urge you to make a further effort to avert such a calamity. You and Mr. Mitchell are joint chairmen of the trade agreement committee of the National Civic Federation. It seems to me that this imposes an additional duty upon you both, and gives an additional reason why each of you should join in making this further effort.

Very respectfully yours,

Theodore Roosevelt.'"

p. 141, l. 1–29.

(276) "The shot firers' bill in Illinois was not passed jointly, as Mr. Mitchell quotes in the other States; it was passed at a time when our miners were under contract to do certain work. It was passed by the strongest labor lobby ever sent to the State capital, a combination of the State Federation of Labor, the United Mine Workers and other labor organizations. The miners have not denied this. It was an outrageous thing to do. As much as we have suffered under that bill it is not to be compared to what we would suffer if it was in full force. The bill, if in full force, would practically shut the mines of Illinois. It would absolutely destroy the competitive relations between Illinois and other States, and it would destroy competitive relations between mines in our own State."

Mr. H. N. Taylor.
p. 147, l. 66.
p. 148, l. 1–10.

(277) "Mr. Bent: The point you make overlooks the point that our scale is not made on the earning power of the men. It is a competitive scale."

p. 152, l. 26, 27.

(278) "Some operators in that State did not care to enter the movement, and we made rates that placed them at a disadvantage."

Mr. J. H. Walker.
p. 165, l. 44, 45.

Note.—Walker referred to Illinois.

(279) "The insterstate scale of wages, which was first framed in 1898 included a provision for the price to be paid for pick mining, so called in the contract, at Danville, Illinois. It included prices to be paid for the same general class of work in Indiana, in the Hocking Valley of Ohio, and in the Pittsburg vein of Western Pennsylvania. Those wages were conceded at the end of long argument, combined with the arbitrament of force in the field. Those relative scale of wages were fixed, and they were not only supposed and believed, but they were intended to place these various districts on a relatively equitable competitive basis. That was always understood. It was understood at the beginning of the formation of this scale, and it has been understood ever since, in theory, as the foundation for this movement."

Mr. Traer.
p. 166, l. 55–66.

(280) "As I understand it, this Ryan Resolution is so worded that if the anthracite people do not agree, or if the Southwestern people are unable to come to an agreement, or, in fact, if any class in connection with this interstate movement cannot come to an agreement, none of us can go to work."

Mr. Moorshead.
p. 179, l. 5–9.

(281) "Mr. Winder: We understand that when the original call was made for a joint conference some eight years ago, it included only the operators and miners of these four States. It was the understanding of the operators at that time, and it is their understanding of the matter now, that no persons not engaged in the business in the four States have any right to participate in any way in the settlement of our scales. We feel that it is difficult enough, large as this meeting is, to reach an agreement, without being subjected to the interference of either operators or miners outside of the four competitive States. We seriously object to any propositions which we make being considered by other miners than those employed by the representatives of the operators here. The larger the scope given to this movement the more difficult it is going to be each year to reach a settlement. If you want to find an easy way of destroying the movement, I know of no better way than to permit any interference whatever from any operator or miner outside the Central Competitive Field."

p. 182, l. 37–50.

(282) "Mr. Winder: In a movement as great as this there must be periods when it is impossible for one district to be able to pay more for mining on account of local conditions that exist, than it is possible to be paid by other districts a part of the joint movement. We are confronted today with this kind of a proposition. The Pittsburg District announces the fact that they are willing to effect a settlement on the basis of a 5.55 per cent advance. It is to be presumed that if they are willing to make a settlement on that basis they are able and can afford to do so. Upon the other hand, the States of Ohio, Indiana and Illinois, with equal sincerity, have attempted to show to you the absolute inability on their part, on account of the conditions existing in their fields, to grant such an advance. I do not believe it can be argued with any justice that, because the Pittsburg District is in a position to pay this advance, the other States must be made to suffer on that account. There are only two ways, it seems to me, this matter can be adjusted with fairness. We all recognize the principle that there are times in a great movement when some sacrifices have to be made in order to continue together. It is therefore only possible to reach an agreement under those circumstances, by a sacrifice being made by the minority in this movement, or else that a differential be agreed to that will enable that part of the field that is unable to pay the advanced scale to work.

"We have no desire in the world to prevent the miners in the Pittsburg District from obtaining an advance, and we regret exceedingly that we are not in a position to offer to our people a similar advance. I trust that this body will consider the propriety of permitting that part of the field that is unable to pay this advance to sign up a scale based upon a proper differential. I can find no other solution for our difficulties at this time, and nobody will regret more than I do the necessity for the suspension or a rupture of our joint relations, which have been of so much value to us in the past."

p. 183, l. 14–41.

(283) "Mr. T. L. Lewis: This discussion this morning is bringing out something of interest. It is of interest to both the operators and miners of this competitive field. It has brought out the fact that there are operators in this convention representing very large interests in the unorganized fields, and these unorganized fields have been mentioned as being a keen competitor of men who are represented in the interstate movement. It seems to me now that one obstacle in the way of arriving at an agreement can be removed by the gentlemen who are interested in the Irwin District agreeing that they will use their influence to bring the properties they represent into this joint movement and pay scale rates at their mines. There can be no argument against it, because it is not the Pittsburg District alone, but there are other interests represented here on the one hand to make contracts with us, and they refer to the fact that we are not able to organize the men in these fields.

"The other day Mr. Cantwell asked Mr. Penna why he had not organized them when he was president of the United Mine Workers. Mr. Penna very properly answered because he was not able to organize them. We might add to that the reason the United Mine Workers have not organized them up to this time is because we cannot. Our failure is due to the opposition of the operators in the Irwin District, and some of those operators are represented in this convention. Now, if we want to be placed on a proper basis, let us all join hands and make those mines union mines, and I think the United Mine Workers can go into the Irwin field and lick the other fellows in very short order."

p. 200, l. 4–26.

(284) "We don't want an industrial fight, but we are not going to pay an increase in wages over those now prevailing until you have shown additional reason why an advance should be paid. The only reason you have shown is simply that you want an advance because you want it, and you are going to have it or paralyze industry in America. You say you want an advance because you believe you are strong enough to get an advance, and the operators have a choice between that and an industrial calamity. If there has been any other reason assigned in any of these meetings, we have not heard it. There have been other excuses, but not any other reason why the advance should be paid. There never was a time in the history of coal production in this country, and there is not likely to be for a long time, when a request for an increased wage could be made with less propriety than at this particular time."

Mr. Penna.

p. 214, l. 43–55.

(285) "I don't know what can be done or how a strike can be avoided, unless perhaps when we cannot agree the people may interfere. It may be that we shall ask them to interfere. The anthracite strike was settled by a commission appointed by a representative of the American people, the President of the United States. I know of no reason why we cannot avert a calamity by the same means, either at this time or in the future. One thing is sure, the American people will not suffer any very great inconvenience because of a disagreement amounting to a paltry $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent in wages. The difference is too small, it is too trifling to warrant a strike of such magnitude as that contemplated by you and feared more or less by ourselves."

Mr. Penna.

(286) "It is my desire at this time in talking to you to state as plainly and in as few words as possible the contention and the things that led up to the contention between the operators of the State of Illinois and the United Mine Workers of America.

"The trade agreement which has been in existence between the operators and miners since 1898 has been at its inception considered the means of settling all future difficulties, and we believed that wisdom and common sense had finally found a way to outweigh force and strife. Being a voluntary contract, as this agreement is, it is worth only the endorsement on its back, namely, the integrity of the parties who are the makers of the contract. When we signed the scale two years ago and had worked under it for several months the miners of the State of Illinois, through a legislative committee, sent a lobby to the State Capitol at Springfield. That lobby became affiliated with the lobby of the Illinois State Federation of Labor, and they were able to pass any bill they put before that legislature, right or wrong. It is not a nice thing to say that our law makers can be influenced by a body possessing a great many voters, but it is so. That bill disrupted the competitive relations between the States of Ohio, Pennsylvania and Indiana and the State of Illinois, in as much as it destroyed the differential at the basing point of Danville. It also disrupted the competitive relations between the different districts in the State of Illinois, and even disrupted competitive relations between mines in the same district. It created chaos. It took away from the miner part of the work he had contracted to do, and put the expense upon the operators, while the miners still continue to receive their pay for the work they did not perform."

Mr. Taylor.
p. 217, l. 21–44.

(287) "If you gentlemen upon that side of the house will provide means by which you can stop the competition from West Virginia, from Kentucky and from Tennessee coming into the City of Indianapolis and into Ohio cities and taking the trade of the Indiana and Ohio miners, then there would be some consistency in this thing. But there is no remedy proposed. This competition is going on, and it will continue to go on. And if the operators have to pay higher prices for the production of their coal in these states it means the closing, the shutting up, the destroying of the value of many of the properties."

Mr. Chapman.
p. 226, l. 17–24.

(288) "Mr. Moorshead: We are denied by law the artificial prices—if you are pleased to call them that—that could be gained by combining our business affairs as you gentlemen do yours. You can combine with impunity—I suppose you have a great number of votes—but if we combine we see the penitentiary pretty well staring us in the face for defying the law. I am very sorry you do not take that seriously, but I want to assure you that it is a very serious matter to the gentlemen on this side. There might be means by which we could control the coal industry if we had money enough to do it in the right way, by buying it all up, but we are unable to accomplish that. It is only a very short time ago, within the memory of our national President, that a number of coal operators in Northern Illinois, who saw fit to send out a schedule of price of coal which had been agreed upon in a meeting among them, were taken into court and fined $500 each for doing it. Is not that right, Mr. Mitchell?

"Mr. Mitchell: They didn't go to the penitentiary, did they?

"Mr. Moorshead: No; they did not go to the penitentiary, but it is a penitentiary offense if the court sees fit to exercise its authority properly. But whether it is or not, we are not going to be law-breakers in that sense; we are going to conduct our business in a reasonably honorable way."

p. 228, l. 43–61.

(289) "The gentlemen from Illinois have suffered so long from the powers of the pit committee, from the dictation of the locals and from conditions that have been placed upon them in one way and another, that it matters not to them whether they operate their properties or not."

Mr. Moorshead.

p. 230, l. 46–50.

(290) "It is a common thing in the State of Illinois to have our operations suspended, sometimes because the president of the local takes the stand to quit at 12 o'clock because they have had trouble among themselves; sometimes because the cars for the mines are on the main track and going by the mine ready to be put on the tracks; but a local has passed a resolution that half of the tonnage in cars must be on the track at starting time or they won't go to work. They say they are not on the side-track and they will not work. How would you like a dose of that kind if you were the owner of a coal mine? And yet those are common indulgences on the part of the miners in Illinois."

Mr. Moorshead.
p. 231, l. 1–8.

(291) "Gentlemen, I am not and never have been an apologist for conditions in the Pittsburg District. I have fought and antagonized—I believe justly—the policy of the Pittsburg Coal Company, and went so far some years ago as to threaten to fill that district with organizers and close their mines after we had signed a scale in this city."

Mr. Mitchell.
p. 257, l. 56–60.

Excerpts from book entitled "JOINT CONVENTION OF THE IILLNOIS COAL OPERATORS' ASSOCIATION and the UNITED MINE WORKERS OF AMERICA.....DISTRICT 12 HELD AT SPRINGFIELD, ILL., May 17 to June 1, 1906.

This book is otherwise known in the record of the case of the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company against John Mitchell and others as McKinley's Exhibit No. 2. [Record pp. 706, 291.]

(292) "No doubt some of you think I am leading up to the proposition of asking you to agree with us that no one in the State of Illinois who is not a member of the Illinois Coal Operators' Association shall be given a scale. I am not going to do that because I don't believe it would be either legal or right. But we do ask you, in all fairness, to impose upon these scabs that you are doing business with an additional cost on their wage scale, which is equivalent to putting us on a basis to do business with you."

Mr. B. F. Bush.
p. 7, c. 2, l. 2–16.

(293) "Now, gentlemen, are you going to put us on a competitive basis with the scabs that are now producing coal in Illinois? That is the first thing we want to know. When that is settled we will know where we are at in the building of a scale. We don't want anything impossible from you, nor do we want anything from you that can be construed by the finest legal mind to be illegal, but we do want justice from you. If you look on us as being friends, or if you look on us as being of any benefit to your organization, we ask you to accord us fair treatment and put us on a level with the people that are now making a little temporary gain on account of our failure to reach an agreement with you. When the time comes those people will throw you up in the air as far as they tried to throw us. Those gentlemen who are working their mines now and shirking their part of the expense of these trade agreements are welcome to the money they are making. I want no relations with them, but I want an assurance from you people that you are going to treat us right in this matter."

Mr. B. F. Bush.
p. 13, c. 2, l. 1–18.

(294) "Mr. Mitchell: This discussion is very much foreign to what I expected when I came here. I don't know whether my conception of right and wrong is as keenly developed as that of the other gentlemen present; but certainly my mind is not in accord with what has been said concerning the policy of this organization. The policy of making separate settlements was favored by me; I believed it then and I believe it now to be a wise policy. We gave no advantages to those men of whom you speak that we did not offer to you. We offered to give you a contract carrying with it the same advance in wages as was given to them. If we were giving them a contract more advantageous than the one we are offering to you, then you would have just cause for complaint. As for giving assurance of what we will do in the future, that cannot be done. Some of you gentlemen here, and Mr. Bush in particular, will remember that in the Southwest we did compel operators to join your association, and you in turn compelled miners to come into our organization. In one case there was an entire sub-district where the miners were receiving 5 cents above the scale made for them, and we were compelled to force some thousands of our members to accept a reduction because you would not permit the operators in your association if they paid a higher scale than was made for them."

p. 13, c. 2, l. 19–57.

(295) "Mr. Newsam: I am one who believes in trade agreements. I have always believed in them. I joined this association in 1898, and I have been on the executive board and the scale committee ever since. I have always believed that these associations joined together would do good if carried on on right lines. I am sorry to say that the miners in the last convention in Indianapolis departed from a principle they had always upheld before. Since 1898 this scale has always been made and signed by the two organizations, not by outside parties who never paid a cent to the joint movement. I know of no organization that has ever done what has been done since we left Indianapolis. I believe that what was done was entirely wrong to both miners and operators. I have been helping to keep up the association, paying my dues to it, going to meetings and trying to make scales, while these other gentlemen have been staying at home and reaping the benefit of my money and my labor. Before this we have always let the majority rule. I believe the majority should rule. I don't believe the minority should rule, especially when the minority runs down to one man. I don't like the Czar, I don't like Witte; and I believe we ought to get together and stop this Czar and this Witte. He may have more money than I have, but I don't think he is a better man. He is a traitor to the cause of unionism from the top of his head to the soles of his feet. And I am not speaking of him alone; there are others in the State of Illinois. They are coming to your organization and offering to sign up, and the people who have been keeping your organization up, the people who have been spending their money and doing the work that benefits both sides, are the ones who have their mines tied up, while these scabs, these miserable scabs, are allowed to go to work and gain an advantage over those who have been the mainstay of your organization. I think this thing ought to be ironed out; I think it ought to be explained. I think what has been done is wrong."

p. 14, c. 1, l. 27–66.
p. 14, c. 2, l. 1–16.

(296) "For myself personally I want to say this: I would rather do business with an association of employers than with individual employers, and as far as I am concerned I am willing to contract with you that no union miner will work for an operator who is not a member of your association if you will hire no one who is not a member of our organization. I am only speaking for myself, now, remember."

Mr. Perry.
p. 15, c. 1, l. 18–29.

(297) "I want the operators that made individual settlements with your people to pay 3 cents a ton more than we do, or 2 cents a ton, or whatever the cost of maintaining this organization is, and 3 cents does not pay for the cost of maintaining this association in the cash donations and the time the members give to it. I will put it on another basis. Make them pay what it costs you to maintain your organization. We don't ask you to give us this money; keep it yourselves if you want it. The competition in this business in Illinois is down to so fine a point that 1 cent a ton will mean our ability to give you work."

Mr. Bush.
p. 15, c. 2, l. 29–46.

(298) "Mr. Perry: I said I would agree, so far as I am personally concerned—and I think the miners will agree with me—that we will refuse to work for any operator in the State of Illinois who is not a member of the Operators Association, if you on your part will agree that none but union men will be hired by members of the Illinois Operators Association.

"Mr. Bush: I will agree to that."

p. 15, c. 2, l. 56–65.
p. 16, c. 1, l. 1.

(299) "I know we cannot get a legal agreement out of you to not work for operators who are not members of the association, and I know you can get no legal agreement from us binding us not to hire men who are not members of your organization. The open shop, although it has not been an open shop, has been a recognized part of our contracts. I trust in the new contract I hope will be drawn it will not only be a recognized fact, but a fact carried out."

Mr. Peabody.
p. 16, c. 2, l. 1–8.

(300) "Now a word as to the production in Illinois as compared with other states. You should take into account, gentlemen, that Illinois is located the best of any State, practically, in the United States to market its coal. It is right on the threshold of the great Northwest with its unlimited market, and the population there is increasing right along. The manufactories in Illinois are increasing rapidly. It is the center of distribution, and the natural one, for the different manufactured products, and that part of our industrial system is increasing very rapidly. The railroad interests in Illinois have grown and they are doing a tremendous business. The fact of the increase I have spoken of in manufacturing and railroad business is the only reason why we have been able to maintain anywhere near the percentage of increase we should."

Mr. Lukins.
p. 47, c. 2, l. 30–52.

(301) "West Virginia is in the wilderness, with no local markets whatever, and the only reason on earth why they can sell their coal at all is on account of their low mining rates. It is a non-union state and is not hampered by the union restrictions as Illinois is. Of course they have a good grade of coal. The mining rate is not all of it. The restrictions thrown around the operations of the mines in Illinois mean a great deal more than a higher mining rate in many instances. After we went into the union we increased the wages of our day men in many instances substantially 50 per cent, but we found our cost had increased 300 per cent. That shows to some extent what the union did for Illinois."

Mr. Lukins.
p. 48, c. 1, l. 1–9.

(302) "Ohio is centrally located between the eastern markets and the western markets. For most of the coal they have to go out of the State to get a market. It can take care of its own home markets, but they do not keep up with its production, and its only other legitimate market is to the west, because east of it is the monster coal fields of West Virginia and Pennsylvania."

Mr. Perry.
p. 55, c. 2, l. 8–18.

(303) "All coal is going west after you leave the Pittsburg District, and one coal shoves the other along."

Mr. Mitchell.
p. 56, c. 2, l. 48–51.

(304) "Mr. Hammond: If it is admitted that the non-union mines increased their output 12,000,000 tons that must have been at the sacrifice of the union mines.

"Mr. Mitchell: That would be true if all this non-union coal went into the markets that were formerly supplied by union coal. I don't know where it went.

"Mr. Hammond: A large proportion of it went into the markets formerly supplied by union coal. Another thing struck me as an odd situation, to say the least, and that is the position we are in, practically as a result of dealing absolutely with union miners, as compared with Kentucky where part of the mines are operated by non-union labor and part by union labor. That is a situation that must be remedied in some way, either by the miners or by the operators, or by both in conjunction. That brings about an unfair competition and there should be some means of correcting it. My idea is that both miners and operators should do everything within their power to correct those matters and to get all the States on a fair competitive basis. I believe that both sides should make reasonable concessions in that direction. There are many of us who know we are out of line so far as competition is concerned with much of our coal with other States, and the indications are that Kentucky can continue, even after we have made an agreement here, to continue to send an ever-increasing amount of tonnage into a territory that rightfully belongs to Illinois. We certainly have a right, as a matter of fairness, to have Kentucky unionized and controlled the same as we are, or that we have a reasonable number of non-union mines in the State of Illinois as a menace against your organization to help us get some of the benefits they enjoy. I simply submit that as a reasonable proposition."

p. 59, c. 2, l. 5–55.

(305) "The fact that 12,000,000 tons more of non-union coal was produced last year than the year before—if it is true—is something that interests us as well as it does you. There is no question about that. I am thoroughly satisfied that if every operator in the joint movement had spent the same amount of money in proportion to his earnings in the coal industry, and the operators as a whole had spent the same amount of time and energy the United Mine Workers have since this movement started, it would have been an utter impossibility for that 12,000,000 in excess of the previous year's tonnage to have been produced. I don't care how we may deal with the details of the situation as we find it in Illinois, we are going to have that question to take up finally and we must solve it if this movement is to last. There is no way of getting around this. When a man we know is a member of our organization, goes into those fields to mine coal he is put out of the organization. I don't believe you can say that much for the members of your organization. I don't know that you have spent a dollar to get these fields in line. And not only that, you have men in your association who are not only not doing anything to help the situation there, but are using what power they have to make it as much worse for us as possible. You retain such men in your association, to say nothing of failing to spend time and money to help control the situation. You even refuse as an association to meet with us and help us get what we know would be a competitive agreement for all those fields, every one of them, non-union and union included, so we would know just what basis those men should be working on. You even refused to lend us your assitance to that extent, let alone coming together with us to make such a contract and have it enforced."

Mr. Walker.
p. 60, c. 2, l. 1–30.

(306) "I believe we ought to have a conference of the coal miners and the operators of the entire country and make a scale for every mother's son of them."

Mr. Walker.
p. 61, c. 2, l. 38–41.

(307) "Of course we cannot enter into an agreement to restrict the output, because that is illegal."

Mr. Hammond.
p. 65, c. 1, l. 45–47.

(308) "Now if you cannot go to the miners in West Virginia and the other non-union fields and convince them that affiliation with your organization will better their condition, not only in the hours of work but in the amount of work they render to the coal operators, when you show them it is without doubt a financial inducement to them to join with you, how in the world can you expect the operators if they have any allied interests in those fields, to go to their friends or anyone else and try to induce them to place themselves in the same position we are in? What inducement is there for us to try to strengthen your organization when we cannot make any money operating with your miners?"

Mr. Hammond.
p. 66, c. 2, l. 11–29.

(309) "Certainly if men in the non-union districts cannot be reached and shown the advantage of belonging to your organization when they are the ones to be benefited, you cannot expect us to do any missionary work among the non-union operators. You can rest assured those gentlemen have not marketed that 12,000,000 tons of coal at a loss. A business does not grow and expand when it is worked at a loss. They are marketing that coal at a satisfactory price, and they have taken the market away from operators who are working with union labor."

Mr. Hammond.
p. 67, c. 1, l. 15–30.

(310) "Mr. Perry said, and I believe he meant what he said, that he had no more use for those people than we had. He said if we would make an argeement to hire no one except members of your organization, you on your part would make an agreement that your men would not work for operators not members of the association. I don't believe we could maintain that position before the public, and I fear you would have more or less trouble in delivering the goods. In the mines that are working non-union here today you will find a great many of your men. If they will go to work in non-union mines, your members working for operators outside of the association would not stay out as long as the independent operators were willing to pay the scale we pay. I don't think, however, there would be anything unfair or out of line in insisting that those operators pay a scale of wages that would bring their cost up to the cost of the association operators. I think you gentlemen ought to give that proposition consideration and give us some assurance that you will help us along those lines."

Mr. Hammond.
p. 67, c. 2, l. 11–40.

(311) "Mr. Peabody:—I proposed in the Indianapolis joint convention what I thought the proper solution. I will read from the records what I said:

'I move that the solution of this whole proposition be reached by adopting the lowest scale of wages we can find for all classes of labor in the mines that are not union mines; the operators to adopt as their selling price the lowest selling prices they can find in the competitive fields that have not been unionized. In that way, gentlemen, we would carry the war into the enemy's camp and get results. If that was carried through, in less than six months there would not be a non-union miner in the United States and not an operator that would not be driven into our association. It is the only logical way of settling the question.'

"Do you want me to read your reply, Mr. Walker?

"Mr. Walker: That is not necessary. I know what I said.

"Mr. Peabody: Why is it not a good proposition?

"Mr. Walker: I cannot agree with Mr. Peabody that he is right. He says that in six months there would not be a non-union miner in the country. I am satisfied that in six months there would not be a union miner, because they could not pay dues. Mr. Peabody is always willing to settle matters at the other fellow's cost.

"In his statement Mr. Bush said that one reason why he could not go before the operators of non-union mines is because the companies we are doing business with have been working for the last two years at a loss, or at least without any profits. I expected he would go on and finish the statement and go on and say, as all the other operators who have taken the floor have said, that the reason they could not go into competition with operators of non-union mines was because of the cheap labor the non-union operators employed. It is reasonable to suppose that temporarily, while getting the first ones to come in, they could not hold out very strong inducements, but if they would all come in they would be able to decide what profits they were entitled to on their investments, and then sell coal in such a way they could get that profit, they might be able to induce them to come in.

"Mr. Bush: You cannot very well go to a man and say to him, 'I am not making any money in my business, but I want you to come in and conduct your business in the same way I do because you are making a little money.' That will not appeal to him very strongly.

"Mr. Walker: The miners have spent millions of dollars trying to get those men to come into the organization.

"Mr. Bush: I know you have, and that is one of the things I cannot understand. I cannot understand why you would have any difficulty in converting your people to come into the organization when you can show it is for their advance and when you have a record of what you have done for those that are in.

"Mr. Mitchell: They would come in if the operators would let them.

"Mr. Walker: I don't want to suggest anything that is illegal, but there is no reason on earth why the bituminous operators cannot make just as good profits as the anthracite operators do except their refusal to conduct business as the anthracite operators do.

"Mr. Bush: You can get six men to agree on something better than you can six thousand.

"Mr. Walker: If the principle is the same there is no reason why they should not agree. I cannot see why you should abuse us for not getting those men in line and compelling their operators to pay prices that will allow you to compete and make a profit, when we are spending millions of dollars, working hard, getting our heads busted and living in the penitentiary in an effort to do that, while you refuse to even mention the matter to the men on the other side. It hardly looks reasonable.

"Mr. Bush: We are not abusing you for that.

"Mr. Walker: There is no doubt that if you could get them in you would be in as good position to increase your profits as we would be to increase our wages if we get the miners in. The only reason why we are in trouble all the time and why you are in trouble all the time is that they are not in."

(312) "We have all had more or less to say about the competitive position of Illinois lately, and I think you will all agree that a state situated as Illinois is, right at the threshhold of the big markets of this country, ought to have a bigger proportion of the tonnage than it has been receiving. If Illinois had as favorable conditions of mining as the eastern states, for instance Ohio and western Pennsylvania, the tonnage would unquestionably be from sixty to seventy-five millions instead of less than forty million tons a year. It occupies the best position, so far as the markets are concerned, of any State that has the coal to fill these markets. Iowa is favorably situated in this respect, but it has not the coal. Illinois, of course, has an unlimited amount of coal. You all know that last year Illinois decreased its tonnage into its Chicago markets very materially, while every other State shipping in there increased its shipments very materially. Chicago is a natural market for a large part of the Illinois coal, and it is being driven out of that market very largely because we cannot compete with other States. The greatest market for our company used to be in Chicago. We used to ship thousands of tons of coal into that market daily, you might say. For the past few years we have been gradually forced out of it on account of our inability to compete with other coal."

(313) "9th. As rapidly as the requisite corps of competent engineers is provided at the different mines, the engineers shall become members of the United Mine Workers of America, and thereafter only members thereof shall be employed as hoisting engineers when such members, competent to fill the positions, can be obtained."

AGREEMENT.
Wages and Conditions to Govern Coal Hoisting Engineers in Illinois from June 1, 1906, to March 31, 1908.

Excerpts from book entitled "PROCEEDINGS OF THE EIGHTEENTH ANNUAL CONVENTION OF THE UNITED MINE WORKERS OF AMERICA: Held in the city of Indianapolis, Ind.: January Fifteenth to Twenty-second inclusive: Nineteen seven.

This book is otherwise known in the record of the case of the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company against John Mitchell and others as Plaintiff's Documentary Exhibit No. 4. [Record pp. 706, 290.]

(314) "In any event, the conferences in the bituminous fields adjourned again without an agreement and the interstate movement, which had been the hope and protection of both miners and operators for many years was dissolved. Thereupon, the miners in separate convention declared that on and after April 1st all men should cease work except those employed by operators who by contract agreed to restore the scale of 1903, plus an advance of three cents a ton in the southwestern states. It was also declared that the miners of outlying districts in the bituminous fields not represented in either of the interstate conferences, whose scale of wages expired on April 1st, should cease work and remain in idleness until the scale of 1903 was restored."

President Mitchell.
p. 36, l. 35–46.

(315) "From 1897 to 1906, the operators and the miners of the central competitive field representing a production of over one hundred million tons of coal annually, or about one-third of all the bituminous coal produced in the United States, have met in annual or biennial joint conference and have, by mutual agreement, fixed the wages and conditions of employment in a manner that was reasonably satisfactory to all concerned. It is true that in arriving at conclusions neither side secured all it desired or all it believed itself entitled to, but on the whole the policy of joint agreements was so far preferable to the old system of annual or biennial strikes and lockouts that the compensating advantages to each so greatly outweighed the losses and vexations occasioned by strikes as to make this method of adjusting wage differences vastly superior to the one it succeeded.

"Now that the smoke of battle has cleared away and the passions and prejudices naturally engendered by contest and conflict have been allayed, it seems to me that in the light of our past experience it would be not only good business policy, but also our duty to each other and to society, to take steps to renew our former relations and re-establish the joint interstate conference; and with that end in view I recommend that the International Executive Board, with the co-operation of the district officers in interest, negotiate with the operators of the central competitive field, during the present year, for an interstate meeting to be held at some suitable time prior to the first of April, 1908. Happily, the interstate movement in the southwest has been preserved, the miners and operators of that field having agreed to meet in Kansas City in the spring of 1908."

President Mitchell.
p. 38, l. 40–45.
p. 39, l. 1–23.

(316) "In West Virginia we have had almost continuous litigation. To such an extent has this been the case that the International Executive Board has retained at an annual salary a strong firm of lawyers, who not only defend our interests against the aggression of our opponents, but who have also vigorously and successfully prosecuted innumerable violators of the law."

President Mitchell.
p. 40, l. 7–12.

(317) "Owing to the depletion of our treasury in the middle of the year (due to the payment of strike benefits), and to a change in the organizing policy in the Irwin and Connellsville fields of Pennsylvania and in West Virginia, our force of organizers was largely reduced; as a consequence, the expense incident to field work was not as great as heretofore."

President Mitchell.
p. 42, l. 2–7.

(318) "In preparing this report I have confined myself as closely as possible to those matters which I deemed to be of greatest moment and of most importance to our trade, but in closing I shall ask your indulgence to make some observations upon a matter which, while somewhat extraneous, is nevertheless so inseparably related to our movement that it comes properly within the purview of this address.

"I refer to the attitude of the American labor movement and to my own position in regard to the political situation as it presented itself during the recent campaign.

"You, no doubt, recall that a manifesto was issued by the Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor, calling upon the organized workers and their friends to support those candidates for legislative positions who held a paid up card in the organization of their craft, and to defeat all candidates, regardless of party affiliations, whose hostility to the measures favored by organized labor was well known. The action of our own convention one year ago in amending the constitution so as to enable salaried international, district and sub-district officers to hold legislative positions seemed to harmonize entirely with the non-partisan political policy of the American Federation of Labor.

"Acting upon this hypothesis, I encouraged members and officers of our organization to seek nomination for legislative positions and advised our members to support such candidates without regard to party affiliation. Whether my advice in this respect was potential or not, I am not prepared to say. I do know, however, that a large number of miners and other trade unionists in mining districts became candidates and secured nominations for membership in the state legislatures and in the Congress of the United States. I have not learned the number of miners elected to the various state legislatures, but I do know that in Pennsylvania alone more miners were elected to the General Assembly in the last campaign than even the most enthusiastic had predicted. And I am sure that every member of our organization and every trade unionist in the United States feels proud of the fact that your International Secretary-Treasurer and the President of District No. 1, Brothers Wilson and Nichols, were elected triumphantly to Congress. Of course, it is not necessary to say that the first duty of these representatives is to their constituents in the congressional districts from which they were elected, and to the people in general of the United States; but the fact remains that this is the first time in the history of our country when men have been elected to Congress who by experience, training and sympathy will be in a position to voice our demands and to advocate the measures especially required for the protection of the underground toilers of the nation.

"I am firmly convinced that the time is not far distant when the organized workmen of America will have representation in the national and state legislatures in proportion to their numbers and to their industrial importance.

"It must not be assumed, however, that a large representation in our legislative bodies will render less necessary the organizations of labor. On the contrary, the power and influence of our representatives will depend in no small degree upon the strength and solidarity of the organized labor movement; but we must exercise great care that the movement to place labor men in legislative positions is not permitted to degenerate into a mad scramble for office. Partisanship and self-interest or personal aggrandizement must be discouraged and frowned upon. Only those who have proved by good work that they have the real interests of labor at heart should receive countenance and endorsement."

President Mitchell.
p. 50, l. 5–44.
p. 51, l. 1–21.

(319) "The calling of a Special National Convention, the modified proposition submitted by the miners' representatives and accepted by certain Operators, and the final action of our own convention to sign local or district agreements is known to you."

Vice President T. L. Lewis.
p. 52, l. 25–28.

(320) "While there has been a large loss in membership during the past year, there has been a steady increase in the membership the past several months, and yet there is a tremendous loss in our membership compared to what it was a year ago."

Vice President T. L. Lewis.
p. 57, l. 1–3.

(321) "Until last year I have supported the views of others and endorsed policies recommended to our members, even though I did not believe those policies were for the best interests of the mine workers of the country. Even last year, after the Special National Convention had agreed upon a policy of signing local or district agreements. I worked as earnestly as any member or officer of the Organization for the success of that policy and I challenge a successful contradiction of this statement."

Vice President T. L. Lewis.
p. 57, l. 22–30.

(322) "I have been an active member of, and assisted in the work of building up, three National Organizations of mine workers. I had also the honor of being one of the delegates that attended the Convention which laid the foundation of the United Mine Workers of America."

p. 58, l. 1–6.

(323) "I believe when the United Mine Workers was instituted that it was to be a National Organization. For years the mine workers of this country have struggled against tremendous opposition to establish a National Organization, National in name, National in purpose and to adopt National methods to deal with National questions affecting the interests of the miners.

"Is the United Mine Workers of America a National Organization in more than name? Does it deal properly with National questions affecting the miners' interests? Can we hope to establish a National eight hour day and our right to organize in certain districts except by a National movement? These are questions the miners of the country must seriously consider.

"Two years ago, or when a reduction was accepted in 1904, the members of our Union were led to believe that all contracts would be made to terminate on the same date, so that we would be prepared to meet and dispose of any issue that confronted us in 1906. At the date of the expiration of the agreement in the Southwest, I made a special effort to have changed to conform with other contracts which expired April 1, 1906, and as a result, this contract was made for a period of nineteen months.

"It was on that date that the miners expected to establish recognition of the United Mine Workers in the Anthracite region. It was on that date that we hoped to establish a uniform eight hour day in Central Pennsylvania. It was on that date that the miners of the Irwin and Connellsville Districts would have joined in a National movement to free themselves from the conditions that have existed so many years in those districts. It was on that date that the opportunity presented itself to establish Hocking Valley prices and conditions in the Pittsburg District, according to promises made in Chicago in 1898. It was on that date that the mine workers of West Virginia would have swung into line and asserted their right to be members of the United Mine Workers."

p. 59, l. 12–44.

(324) "If the United Mine Workers is a National Organization, it should establish National reforms and make them apply to all alike.

"If national reforms, to be established in the mining industry, require a national movement, then those reforms cannot be established by a sectional effort. This has been proven by the millions of dollars we have spent in that kind of an effort in Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Tennessee, Alabama and Colorado.

"If States or districts are allowed and directed to legislate for themselves on questions of a National character, then there is no need for a National Organization of miners.

"Regardless of what may have been said by some members of the United Mine Workers, even some who hold official position, I am a firm believer in an International organization of our craft. In fact, the American continent is not large enough to maintain two Organizations of miners.

"These things are mentioned for the benefit of the United Mine Workers of the country. With this information you will understand that there is work to do, if we desire to maintain what we now have and to bring the unorganized mine workers up to our standard.

"To clear the minds of all the mine workers of the country and to strangle many falsehoods that are being circulated in regard to my position on the policy of the United Mine Workers of America, I desire to make clear at this time, that"

Vice President T. L. Lewis.
p. 61, l. 13–37.

(325) "I favor:

"1. One Organization of the mine workers of the American Continent.

"2. I favor the establishment of a National eight hour day for every person employed in and around the mines.

"3. I favor a complete recognition of our right to organize in every mining district in the country.

"4. I recognize that there are certain local markets that naturally belong to certain coal producing districts.

"5. I favor giving every operator an equal opportunity to secure his share of the general markets."

Vice President T. L. Lewis.
p. 61, l. 37–45.
p. 62, l. 1, 2.

(326) "Secretary-Treasurer W. B. Wilson read the following report:

"Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention:

"I herewith submit for your consideration my financial report for the year ending November 30, 1906:

"Beginning with the first of April we had for a prolonged period over 400,000 men on strike. We had on hand in the International treasury at the close of business March 31, 1906, $361,951.87. It must be apparent to everyone, as it was to the International Executive Board, that this amount of money was insufficient to take care of all the men who were idle as a result of our failure to reach an agreement with the operators. Consequently it was decided to hold the money in the International treasury until the various locals, sub-districts and districts had exhausted their funds, and if they had not secured a settlement by that time, to use the funds in the International treasury at those points where assistance was most needed and where it would best protect the interests of all. Fortunately, many settlements were arrived at before it was necessary to draw much on the International treasury.

"District No. 2, Central Pennsylvania, and District No. 6, Ohio, were the last ones to secure a settlement and all of the International funds were expended in those two districts in the last few weeks of the conflict. This policy was absolutely necessary because it cannot be gainsaid that if the miners of either of those districts had been defeated it would ultimately have been disastrous to all of the miners of the United States.

"As a matter of fact, at the close of business July 11, we had expended $37,707.59 more money than we had in the treasury. The International Executive Board at its meeting in June, realizing the necessity for more funds with which to conduct the strike, levied an asseeement of 50 cents per week upon those who were at work, beginning with the 15th of June. Only $195.80 was realized from this assessment during the month of June, and very little until after the middle of July, when the payments for work performed in June were being made. In this crisis your International Officers began negotiations with districts that were known to have money in their treasuries to induce them to pay their assessments in bulk for all of their Locals. On the 12th of July the first payment in this manner was made by District No. 12 of Illinois, amounting to $100,000.00. District 13, Iowa, followed soon after with $35,000.00, and as settlements had been secured for a majority of the men in Ohio and Central Pennsylvania by that time, our financial crisis had passed.

"With the large number of men we had on strike and the comparatively small amount we had in the treasury we were unable to contribute sufficient money to the various districts to enable them to pay very large strike benefits. This created dissatisfaction and the question was frequently asked, 'What has become of our money?'"

(328) "President Mitchell: The chair does not want to consume the time of the convention, but there is one feature of the question you should understand. It was upon a recommendation made by myself, which was incorporated in one of my annual reports, that the separate organizations of mechanical trades were broken up and the men compelled to become members of the United Mine Workers of America. It was through Mr. Duncan and myself, in the American Federation of Labor, that the autonomy resolution which gives us jurisdiction over these trades was written. It was by my advice that the officials of Indiana told the engineers they would have to leave their separate union and join ours."

(329) "Delegate Walker: If a member of our organization in good standing leaves a mine and goes to work in a non-union mine, can we add to the initiation fee a fine when he wants to come back?

"President Mitchell: The local unions have a right to place fines on members for violation of their rules."

(330) "Delegate John T. Dempsey, for the Committee on Officers' Reports, presented the following report:

Indianapolis, Ind., Jan. 18, 1907.

To the Officers and Delegates of the Eighteenth Annual Convention. Greeting:

We, your Committee on Officers' Reports, beg leave to report that we have carefully examined the reports of our President, Vice President and Secretary-Treasurer."

p. 269, l. 38–45.

(331) "POLICY OF THE FUTURE.

"Your committee approves of our President's recommendation on this vital question, and would also recommend that our International officers be empowered to negotiate with the operators of the central competitive field for an interstate meeting, to be held some time prior to the expiration of our present contracts. We further recommend that this convention instruct our officers to make a reasonable effort to secure the admission of all soft coal producing States desiring admission to the joint interstate movement."

Delegate John T. Dempsey.
p. 270, l. 17–25.

(332) "BOARD MEETINGS AND ORGANIZERS.

"Your committee recommend that this convention heartily approve of the Board's action in withdrawing a part of our organizing force from active service, as a result of a depleted treasury, but we further recommend that the force be increased whenever, in the discretion of the Board, our funds would warrant.

Delegate John T. Dempsey.
p. 270, l. 38–40.
p. 271, l. 1–3.

(333) "The motion to adopt the report of the Committee on Officers' Reports was carried by a unanimous vote.

"Delegate Dempsey, for the Committee, read the following report on the report of Vice-President Lewis:

VICE-PRESIDENT.

"We, your committee, after careful deliberation on Vice-President Lewis' report, would say that the same shows that our Vice-President was actively engaged during the year, and rendered valuable service to the organization in negotiating settlements of wage and other questions.

"Vice-President Lewis' report not being classified, your committee can only deal with the same in a general way.

"The Vice-President's review of the events that took place subsequent to our convention last spring, as mentioned in his report, are his own personal opinions. However, your committee reserves the same right to their opinions, and we disagree with our Vice-President in his report as to the wisdom of pursuing certain lines of action, and particularly the attitude of our Vice-President on the signing of sectional agreements in the several states. That results might have been more advantageous to our organization had a different policy been adopted is merely problematical and conjecture. The policy pursued was in harmony with the deliberate judgment of our last special convention. Taking into consideration the many complications confronting us at that time, together with the demoralized condition of our joint forces and a chaotic state of affairs on every hand existing as a result of the strained relations between the two divergent forces—operators and miners—we believe that the very best possible results have been attained under the circumstances, and congratulate our organization upon the fact that it has emerged from the conflict with honor and our organization has been preserved intact.

"Hence your committee recommends a continuation in the future of the same wise, conservative, business-like policies."

"Delegate J. H. Walker—I move the adoption of the report of the Committee on Officers' Report. (Seconded.)"

p. 272, l. 19–45.
p. 273, l. 1–8.

(334) "Had I believed that a national strike would have involved the miners of West Virginia, of Virginia, of Meyersdale, Pa., of the Georges Creek District of Maryland, of the Connellsville, the West Penn Road and the Irwin Field in Western Pennsylvania, had I believed it would have involved the men of Alabama, of Colorado, of Utah, of Wyoming, of Washington—had I believed you could have stopped those non-union mines there would no one have favored a national strike more than I. But I did not believe it then, and I do not believe it now. I do not believe a national strike would have stopped any considerable number of men in any of the non-union fields of this country."

President Mitchell.
p. 275, l. 31–42.

(335) "In the middle of April the International Executive Board held a meeting in this city. The question of our policy was under consideration. An application has been received from Ohio asking what we should do in the Crooksville District, if I remember right. A sub-committee consisting of the Vice-President, the Secretary-Treasurer and myself were appointed to define a policy for the government of our various district organizations, so far as settlements were concerned, and this is what we unanimously reported to the Board, and it was unanimously adopted by them:

"'We are of the opinion that the representatives of our organization should demand a full restoration of prices and conditions of employment which prevailed in 1903, and, in addition thereto, should retain any advantages secured in 1904 and 1905. If, however, it becomes apparent to the responsible officer in charge of the miners' interests in any conference with the operators, that an agreement on this basis cannot be reached the Board believe and advise that where operators are willing to pay the advance provided for in the Perry resolution, to-wit: five cents per ton on screened coal, three cents per ton on run-of-mine, four cents per ton for machine mining in Ohio, the restoration of the machine mining rate in Indiana and Illinois, an advance of 5 9-10 per cent. on dead work and yardage prices, rather than engage in a strike, settlements should be effected even though we are forced to accept the conditions of 1904 and 1905, plus the advance referred to herein.

"'This information is not to be communicated to our membership, but is intended solely for the guidance of the officers having general supervision over the making of agreements.'"

President Mitchell.
p. 278, l. 13–41.

(336) "I desire to say with reference to the strikes of 1894 and 1897, that the strike of 1894 took place at a time in the history of this country when there was a great depression in industry. That strike took place on a falling market. That strike ended in a compromise. In the strike of 1897, or during the period of which it is said the production of West Virginia coal increased to such a large extent, it is a well known fact that there were approximately nineteen thousand men working in the mines of West Virginia. It is also a well known fact that there were twelve thousand of those men on strike during the strike period. It is also a well known fact that when we met in Columbus, Ohio, to consider a compromise proposition with the operators that the West Virginia delegation was in that convention, and that for two days and a part of another the delegates from Illinois and the delegates from Ohio stood side by side in demanding that there be no settlement unless the men in West Virginia were included. It is also a well known fact that a compromise resolution was offered. As a result of that resolution, which read that we would accept the compromise offered by the operators, the miners of Western Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana and Illinois would not return to work for ten days in order to give the West Virginia men an opportunity to make a contract. It is a well known fact that because of the wording of that resolution the West Virginia men believed their interests were being protected and voted it and carried it in the convention by a bare majority, and when some one, realizing what was at stake, asked for a reconsideration of that motion, Mr. Ratchford said it was too late, it had gone to the press of the country. What was the result? There could be but one result. The West Virginia men went home without a settlement. Some of the men in the other States went to work before the end of the ten days. Our brothers in Illinois continued to strike. Following that period this organization put men in the field to boycott the coal coming from West Virginia. And this is another opinion of mine, that the boycott was placed on West Virginia coal, and our men going into the markets of different sections of the country saying to the public 'Don't buy West Virginia coal because it is produced by non-union men; don't buy it because it is produced cheaper than union coal,' did more to advertise West Virginia coal than any strike that ever took place in this country.

"So far West Virginia has continued to increase its production by leaps and bounds, so much so that there are probably more than fifty thousand men working in that State. Their product crosses ours in the market, and, while I respect the opinion of every man, while I respect President Mitchell's opinion, that does not necessarily mean I should be deprived of expressing mine. And my judgment is based upon past experience. When we organize West Virginia, when we organize the unorganized sections of Pennsylvania, we will organize them by a strike movement.

Some man will say this is a matter to be determined by the future. That is true; but while it is true, coal from those States is crossing the union States and going into the markets that we ought to supply. If evidence is needed, we have only to refer to the coal reports of the union States to see that there is not the increase in their production they ought to have, notwithstanding the fact they have home markets."

(337) "At the last special convention held in the city of Indianapolis, we were confronted with a serious situation. The convention decided by a majority vote the policy that would be pursued, although many delegates did not believe that was the best policy that could be pursued. I was one of them. I believe that better and more speedy results could have been secured by reaffirming and reiterating the famous Ryan resolution that was adopted at the convention in January."

Delegate Green.
p. 284, l. 46.

(338) "In referring to the National suspension of 1897 I desire to refresh your memories by saying to you that the result of the National suspension of that year, in addition to what President Mitchell has said, and in addition to what Vice-President Lewis has said, was the cause of the revival of the joint agreement, which has been of so much benefit to all of us. For some years previous to 1897 that agreement had been dissolved. That strike, in addition to securing for us an advance in wages and the re-establishment of the joint movement, provided for a convention a few months later to be held in Chicago. That convention secured to the United Mine Workers of this country an eight-hour day. This result, secured in Chicago in 1898, can be traced to and identified with the results of the National suspension of 1897. In addition to that it gave an impetus to the organization. It created in some of the unorganized fields a sentiment in favor of organization, and in others crystallized a sentiment already existing there. After the suspension of 1897 the organization went forward in leaps and bounds.

"One reason why I believe a National suspension would have brought the best and most speedy result is because, as you know and as I know, and as subsequent events have proved, it would have prevented the dissolution of the interstate movement. I am exceedingly desirous of seeing the joint movement re-established, and will do all that is in my power to bring about that most desirable result. I recommended to our convention in Columbus last week that they instruct the officers to co-operate with the National and do all in their power to bring about the re-establishment of the interstate joint movement."

Delegate Green.

(339) "If I do not understand the report of the committee, I want to understand it. I believe their recommendation is, after summing up the report of Vice-President Lewis, that the same wise, conservative policy be pursued in the future that has been pursued in the past. I would like to know whether or not that means to commit this organization to the same policy, no matter what the circumstances or conditions are, that are pursued in the last general settlement. I would like to know whether or not the adoption of the report of the committee would mean that we commit ourselves to at all times in the future adopt a policy of settling by sections? If that is the intention of the committee, I don't believe the organization can afford to commit itself to such a policy. Conditions may change and circumstances arise which may cause some subsequent convention to deem it wise to declare in favor of a National settlement. If that is true, will this convention commit itself absolutely and unreservedly to a policy of sectional settlements? We cannot afford to do that, because the operators of the country would take advantage of such a declaration and say to us when we seek to again establish the joint interstate movement, 'You have gone on record as favoring the same policy that was pursued last year, and we claim the same right to make our settlements sectionally and locally and follow out the policy you have already laid down.'

"I say to you, gentlemen, one reason why I oppose the policy that was pursued last year was because over in Ohio we were peculiarly situated. We had West Virginia on the south and Pennsylvania on the east, and after four months of a strike in Eastern Ohio we had reached the danger line. We felt keenly the competition from West Virginia, and during the suspension our miners in Ohio chafed under the object lesson they had. They saw West Virginia coal go by, trainload after trainload passing their doors, when they were on strike. This coal supplied the markets that they should have had. There is no disguising the fact, something must be done to remedy this condition. Year after year Ohio has had to go home and strike in some portion of the district to enforce the interstate agreement that was signed up here. Ohio, because of her peculiar location, has been an impregnable defense for the States west, and has met successfully and resisted to a man the going westward of the conditions in Pennsylvania and West Virginia. If West Virginia increased her tonnage one million tons in 1897, reports show that last year she increased it five million tons, and has taken from Ohio many local markets she has claimed, and has had a right to claim. Reports show that Pennsylvania increased her production about two-thirds the tonnage of Ohio. While this increase in production has been going on in their districts, Ohio has been practically standing still. Do you then wonder that in Ohio some means for bringing about better results is uppermost in the minds of our people? I confess here and now that the overwhelming sentiment in Ohio was that a settlement by sections would not correct the conditions we complained of.

"Now, something must be done; it is absolutely necessary to protect us against the competition that comes from the unorganized fields east of us. I believe a National movement would have induced West Virginia to become organized and that, like other districts in 1897, it would have meant the organizing of that field. That would have brought us the protection we so richly deserve, and that is so absolutely necessary for us to have. Even during the suspension there developed a pronounced sentiment among our people in Ohio in some localities where they were on strike in favor of stopping even those who had signed the 1903 scale."

p. 287, l. 1–45.
p. 288, l. 1–12.

(340) "As to the main issue that is being discussed, I disagree with Vice-President Lewis and President Green of Ohio. Since the time of the National convention all the information I have been able to secure has convinced me that the policy advocated by them would have been disastrous to the organization, and that the policy we adopted was the very best that could have been adopted at that time and under the conditions then existing. From the knowledge I have gained in the past year, added to what little I knew prior to that time, if the same question came up in this meeting, not only would I do what I did then, but if there was anything I could conceive of, no matter what would have been the result to me as an individual, to prevent the policy advocated by those two brothers being adopted, I would do that in addition to what I did before.

"I have been coming to these conventions for a long time, and on some matters, I have been set down, particularly by some of the men interested in this question, as an impractical dreamer. I want to say that I have been fully prepared to meet these people, and I say now if ever there was an impractical dream advocated, if ever there was an absolute absurdity advocated, if ever there was an idea advocated that meant, if we were to adopt it, the annihilation of this organization, it was the one they stood for, the putting into force at any cost of the Ryan resolution. The Ryan resolution provided that we would all sign up or we would all refuse to sign up. I don't believe there is a man in our organization, or outside of it, I don't believe there is even a socialist in the country, who is foolish enough to attempt to get up before any body of men who have had experience in this movement and say that resolution could have been put into effect. The proposition itself as advocated by these people is almost as foolish as the position they are taking that the adoption of the report of the Committee on Officers' Reports would commit this organization to a set policy when acting on such questions in the future. I think it is clearly the intent of the committee to endorse the position taken by the organization in the past in dealing with such questions. In dealing with some of these questions in the past a National suspension has been ordered, and, so far as the organization could control things, settlements were made nationally. Last year sectional settlements were made, but in both cases the men who considered the matter carefully did the best that could be done under the circumstances. That is the policy the report of the committee endorses, and that is what the report of the committee provides for a continuance of."

Delegate J. H. Walker.
p. 289, l. 21–46.
p. 290, l. 1–17.

(341) "The original scale that was drafted as a National proposition put the Western Pennsylvania, the Ohio, the two Indiana districts and the Illinois operators on a competitive basis. It was understood that if one of them got an advantage it would disturb that equitable basis."

Delegate J. H. Walker.
p. 290, l. 31–35.

(342) "I want to say to you frankly that, notwithstanding their statements, if you will leave the report of Vice President Lewis in the hands of an impartial judge, a man with a knowledge of the facts in the case as they affect our organization, and ask him if it is an honest personal opinion or an attack on President Mitchell and the men who believe in the policy adopted at the last convention, I am satisfied he would decide it was about the ablest attack of that character that could be made under the circumstances. I believe that ninety-nine out of every one hundred such impartial men would so decide.

"Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to give some consideration to the question of a National suspension. The National suspension in 1897 and the suspension in 1906 were two entirely different propositions. The markets were against us in 1906, which was not the condition in 1897. So much for that portion of the report.

"Now I want to ask any man, even the most idle dreamer on earth, who knows anything about the situation in Western Pennsylvania, the situation in the Connellsville coke region, the situation in West Virginia and Virginia, would any action taken by this convention be the means of getting those men out on strike? I put in two years in that region myself, and while I do not claim to know everything in connection with it, I do know something of that field. In 1897 Fred Dilcher started in at one end of the Kanawha and went right through the region. He was allowed to talk in the camps and every man was allowed to form his own opinion. I would like to see the man who would start in at the top of Kanawha and go to New River and talk to those men now. About the time you leave Cincinnati going up there you would get a pretty able body guard to attend you. There would not be a minute of your time after leaving Cincinnati until you got into Virginia when you would not be watched. They have complete control of the surface of the land in that state where we are interested. They have complete control of the judges, of the juries, the police force, the militia and all the thugs they want up there. They have plenty of deputy sheriffs, each one with a commission, a big forty-five, and a big club, but if you take a club and a gun along you will get fifty dollars and sixty days, and if you don't take them along you will get your brains beaten out. If a coal miner says, 'Hello, Jack, how are you?' from across the street he gets his time next morning. The mines are distant from the towns and the majority of them are not even reached by a public road. The only stores there are company stores, and the minute the men come out on strike they are prevented from getting anything, except what is brought to them. I don't care how good a man is, or how strong his union principles, or how willing he is to strike, unless you can furnish means for him to keep his family alive it is impossible to keep him out. I agree with President Green and Vice President Lewis that you never can get those men organized except at the end of a general strike, but I warn you not to go into it until you are thoroughly prepared. If you are not prepared to take care of those men when you call them out, you will only victimize the poor fellows who have the courage to join you and have them driven out of there. I ask any man who has any knowledge of the situation if, even during the two months suspension last year, he believes there was enough money in the organization to have carried on that sort of fight in West Virginia, old Virginia and Maryland? There was not enough money, even if we took every cent in the national treasury and every cent in the district treasuries, and did not give a cent to our own members.

"When I see people who will adopt questionable tactics to push themselves to the front, I confess I have not much respect for them. I do not say that we had such people in the case we are discussing, I merely make the general statement, but I do not want to say to you frankly and freely that I believe the policy outlined by our last special convention on the proposition that was up for settlement was the very best that could be adopted. I believe a majority of the men who were conducting negotiations lost sight of their own interests entirely and tried to do only what was best for the organization. I believe if the other policy had been adopted the same men would have gone into the fight and would have done the very best they could to win. I don't believe there is a man who voted for that settlement on the other side who would have attempted to criticise those actions until the final result had been brought about, and I believe there would have been no harsh criticism of any individual, even if the result proved disastrous. I don't believe the practice of throwing cold water on the efforts of the men who have to carry out the policies we adopt is the proper thing to do."

(344) "I am one of those who believe that the policy adopted last year, that of settling where we could make settlements on the 1903 scale, was the proper thing to do."

Delegate Patrick Gilday.
p. 296, l. 6–8.

(345) "Now, Mr. President, I have no fault to find with Vice-President Lewis. Our relationship is friendly, but I do not believe he has a right to embody in his annual report such statements as he has without questioning the district or sub-district officers in Central Pennsylvania in regard to conditions there. If he had done that he would have discovered that he had been misinformed. I object to the statements that we have just now established the open shop, and that we have only a limited check-off. I hope Vice-President Lewis will correct his statements in regard to these matters."

Delegate Patrick Gilday.
p. 296, l. 23–32.

(346) "The future alone will determine whether or not the position of last year was correct. It is not a question of President Mitchell's policy, it is not a question of Vice-President Lewis' policy; the future will determine what policy we will be required to adopt in order to best preserve and safeguard the interests of the mine workers of this country. In doing this it will be necessary for the mine workers of this country to know all the facts in regard to all the conditions in the mining industry from one end of the land to the other. No one has made the statement that we can organize West Virginia without a strike. If we can I will be one of the best pleased men in this organization, whether I am an official or whether I am working in the interests of the men while serving them in the ranks. That has been my position in the past and it will be my position in the future. In whatever position I am serving the miners of this country there won't be any differences of opinion between my colleagues and myself when the miners have determined on a policy; but in order that all the men may know what conditions prevail in the country, I believe as one of their representatives, I would be lax in my duty, that I would not be doing justice to the men who are struggling for improved conditions, if I did not point out to them the obstacles in the way of success, and what, in my opinion, would bring that success."

Vice President Lewis.
p. 310, l. 5–27.

(347) "President Mitchell: It was not my intention to speak again upon the subject under consideration; but in making my short address yesterday in defense of the policy adopted by your convention one year ago, and executed by your district and international officers, I failed to call attention to some features I believe would be of interest to you.

"Let me say, prefatory to presenting them to you, that I have repeatedly stated that, in my opinion, West Virginia, the Irwin field, the Connellsville coke region, Southern Colorado and the Georges Creek district would not be thoroughly organized except as the result of a successful strike. I repeat that opinion now; but I want to add to it that they will not be organized at all, strike or no strike, unless we are able to support the men in those fields from the first day they lay down their tools. One year ago that was a consideration with me. I didn't believe they would have struck then. I don't believe it now, and if they had struck you would have had no money to support them and no resources from which to draw revenue, because when the union men were on strike you had cut off the only source of revenue."

p. 310, l. 28–46.

(348) "Now I believe it is possible, indeed I believe it is probable, that in the not distant future we will be able to inaugurate a movement in West Virginia and the other unorganized fields that will involve them in a strike, and then we will expect you to furnish the sinews of war, as you have done in the past, to keep these men in idleness."

President Mitchell.
p. 311, l. 1–6.

(349) "If one year hence it is my judgment that a suspension of mining throughout the United States would be best, I will favor that policy. If, on the other hand, I am of the opinion that partial settlements are best, I will favor partial settlements."

President Mitchell.
p. 313, l. 7–11.

(350) "This morning Delegate Walker spoke of the Ryan resolution. While that was a very drastic measure it was carried by very nearly a unanimous vote of the convention. One man opposed it but he has since been relegated to the rear for opposing that resolution and voting in another manner when he went into the joint convention. We knew when we were voting for that resolution we were doing the right thing. We believed it still when we met here in special convention in March. The miners of Ohio believe it now."

Delegate G. W. Savage.
p. 323, l. 45, 46.
p. 324, l. 1–7.

(351) "When we founded the United Mine Workers we intended that we should, if one State had to be called out, call out all the others with it. We want all the States to come out together, and we want every man to stand by his brother, shoulder to shoulder, to show the operators what we can do. If we don't continue that policy, if we go on settling by sections, we might as well give up the organization. If we don't go together to ask for a settlement we had better abandon the organization and let every one settle for himself."

Delegate William Kinkade.
p. 337, l. 38–46.

(352) "I realize that the unorganized districts of this country not only are a menace to themselves, but they are a menace to the organized workers who wish for better things. How to secure better conditions in those fields is something that is better known to our executive officers than to me. Speaking of the joint movement and its dissolution, I want to refer briefly to the fact that when we were parting after our regular convention last year our demand for recognition was pending. The Ryan resolution of which we have heard so much, had been introduced, but I claim it had served its purpose when we reconvened again in the special convention, although great stress is laid upon the fact that it was in force at that time, and that it was in force even at the end of the joint convention.

However, I want to call the attention of the delegates to the fact that when we came to the special convention and our scale committee renewed its demands, they carried with them a demand that Iowa be admitted to the joint movement. You all know how the interstate conference proceeded to make a scale on the line of the joint movement alone. Now, I speak for my own district when I say that some day we propose to right our own wrongs, and if ever the course of this organization is so shaped that we go on the field of conflict, we want to make that struggle so interesting to every portion of our membership that they will have a healthy interest in working for its final success. We are not without troubles in our own state; we have many difficulties such as I have heard discussed in this meeting, but we do not think this is the proper place to air them. I think such things can better be taken care of in the respective districts than they can after being discussed here. I think our organization has emerged from the crisis of last year with considerable credit, and I believe we will be able to demonstrate that in a practical manner in the future."

(357) "PRESIDENT WATKINS' REPORT.

"To the Officers and Delegates of Sub-District No. 5 of District No. 6, U. M. W. of A.

"Brother Delegates: We have assembled in the ninth annual convention of our sub-district. Before submitting to you my report permit me to heartily congratulate you and our members on the large and splendid representation in this convention.

"One year ago you honored me by electing me president of our sub-district. At that time we were in hopes that we would be able to arrange a wage scale without very much trouble. In this we were disappointed, and succeeded in getting a wage contract signed after a prolonged and bitter strike lasting four months.

"That the greatest strike of the year was not finally settled until after we had held six joint conventions in this sub-district. The first convention was held April 12, 13, and 14, in Wheeling, W. Va. After being in session three days we adjourned without reaching an agreement. The next joint convention was held at Canton, O., April 16, 17 and 18, for the north end of Sub-District. We also failed to reach an agreement for that part of the Sub-District. The next joint convention was held at Wheeling, W. Va.,

April 23 and 24 at which time there was a scale formulated on the basis of the 1903 contract and this scale was signed by a few operators.

"The next joint convention was held at Wheeling, W. Va., June 27, 28, 29 and 30. After four days' session was adjourned without reaching an agreement. We then held another joint convention at Canton, O., July 11, 12 and 13, 19 and 20, at which we succeeded in effecting a settlement for the north end of the sub-district. The last joint convention was held at Wheeling, W. Va., July 24, 25, 26 and 27, at which time a settlement was reached on a basis of the present scale under which our men are now working."

p. 4, l. 26–37.
p. 5, l. 1–24.

(358) "At our last annual convention it was unanimously decided that the Eastern Ohio scale should apply to the West Virginia Pan Handle counties. The operators of those counties refused to meet us in joint convention to sign a general scale. Some of the operators even refused to sign a contract and this resulted in several local strikes, all of which were settled except the one now on at Elm Grove where the men are on strike and are standing firm. It is with regret that some of the locals in the Pan Handle broke away and the members went to work without any union or without getting a scale signed.

"I am of the opinion that there are many good active union men in the Pan Handle counties, and that if we all work together we can organize every mine worker in that section and establish scale rates."

President Watkins' Report.
p. 6, l. 11–25.

(359) "In past conventions there have been many resolutions passed, condemning the practice of working on idle days. It is reported to me that in some mines, this resolution is being violated by our members, who are working on idle days. I would advise that our members adhere strictly to the resolution, and that local unions use every effort to enforce the rule prohibiting men from working on idle days."

(360) "REPORT OF SECY.-TREAS. LEE RANKIN.

"To the Delegates of the 9th Annual Convention of Sub-District 5 of District 6, U. M. W. of A.

"As your Secretary-Treasurer I have the honor and pleasure of submitting to you and the members of sub-district 5, a report of my work with a report of the membership and the finances of this sub-district for the year beginning March 1, 1906, and ending February 28, 1907.

"It is a matter of history that last year was no exception to the rule in Eastern Ohio—that the miners had to strike before a wage contract could be secured.

"We were hopeful, that when partial settlements were made with a few large corporations in Pennsylvania by the United Mine Workers, that there would be an early settlement of our differences in Eastern Ohio. Subsequent developments proved that our hope was without foundation.

"After several attempts to reach an agreement with the Operators of sub-district 5, our members were compelled to strike and that strike developed into the most bitter struggle that has taken place since the formation of our sub-district.

"The failure of the district organizations to provide each striking member with benefits to the amount of $3.00 per week caused considerable friction and this was taken advantage of by the enemies of the organization. What for a time seemed to be division in our ranks encouraged certain operators with the hope that they could crush our organization. In this hope they were doomed to disappointment, as later developments fully demonstrated.

"When the district organization found that they could not comply with the constitution in the payment of strike benefits, a system of paying relief in orders was established. This policy was condemned and denounced by a few men, who did not stop to consider why the system was established.

"After a great deal of work on the part of your representatives, the reason for adopting such a policy was made clear to the members, who then took renewed courage and showed a determination to win in the struggle that then existed.

"With all the obstacles that we had to overcome last year, we have reason to feel proud that sub-district 5 came out of the strike with such credit to itself and the principles of unionism that it represents.

"To the fidelity, unity and activity of the mine workers of this sub-district is due the credit for winning in the struggle of last year. If any mistakes were made in that contest, let us profit by the experience of the past and be that much better prepared for the future."

"Where bottom coal not to exceed 4 inches in thickness is required to be taken up in wide rooms and said coal is in normal state and parts freely from the bottom, the miner must take it up without extra compensation.

"Where coal sticks to bottom and extra labor is required to lift same, the company shall pay loader extra at a rate per crossing based upon maximum inside day labor scale.

"A committee of two operators and two miners to investigate and determine the method of payment on basis named.

"This committee shall determine what constitutes a sticky bottom.

"If a machine cutter leaves a sprag or a thick bottom in excess of 4 inches he shall be notified to remove same, and should he refuse he shall be charged 50 c. for each sprag or bottom, the same to be paid to the loader.

"Rule 13—That all machine loaders be accorded two rooms for each two men, and the operators pledge themselves to provide two rooms for two men at the earliest possible moment, but in the event of territory becoming scarce through a squeeze or striking horseback, or any unavoidable obstacle, this shall not be construed so as to diminish the output of the mine.

"Rule 14—There shall be no free turns allowed for either rooms or entries. The entries shall be driven as fast as operators desire or conditions permit; but in no case shall entry miners be allowed more cars than room miners, and at least once each pay the turn shall be made uniform throughout the mine for the time previously worked. If, however, the regular turn will not allow cars enough to drive the entries as fast as desired, the operators shall increase the number of miners in each entry, so that by giving to each the regular turn, the entries shall be driven as fast as two miners could do with full work.

"If, however, the room men decline to take their place in the entries when requested to do so by the operator, then the entry man shall have free turns until the entries are driven their required length.

"Rule 15—Miners shall exercise proper care in posting the soapstone in rooms, in order to prevent falls. When coal is taken out by the person employed in a room and soapstone falls to the amount of 750 pounds, it shall be removed by the miner without compensation, and when the fall of soapstone exceeds 750 pounds the miner shall be paid for removing it, or the company remove the same.

"Rule 16—Checkweighmen may be placed on tipple at expense of miners, and his duties shall be those prescribed by the laws of the State of Ohio, and all weigh scales may be tested by the miners at any reasonable time.

"Rule 17—Members of the Pit Committee and local officers shall remain at their working places the same as all other employes, unless a miner and a mine boss fail to agree on prices to be paid for extra work when they may be called in to confer with the superintendent to decide the dispute. This, however, shall not prevent the committee from looking after the proper interest pertaining to the miners' organization.

"It is understood that mine committees have no authority to order a suspension of work except upon a vote of three-fourths of the members of the local union.

"Rule 18—All rooms shall be 24 feet wide or over. Machine rooms, when ordered by mine boss, driven less than 24 feet wide, entry price shall be paid.

"Rule 19—Where entries are ordered driven fifteen degrees or more away from the line of butts or face, 25 cents extra per yard shall be paid in pick and machines, but shall not be construed to apply to necessary curves in turning one entry from another, and in order to lay track on a required radius.

"Rule 20—Any rule, either local or general, governing the scale or conditions of employment in the Pittsburg vein of Sub-District No. 5, shall be mutually agreed to by the operators and miners interested, and said rules, before being enforced, shall receive the endorsement of the officials of the operators and officials of District No. 6, United Mine Workers of America.

"Rule 21—No meeting shall be held during working hours, except by mutual arrangement between miners and superintendent.

"Rule 22—On the day that death by accident to an employe occurs in the mine, for that day only, the miners may cease working, but under no circumstances shall the mine be made idle for any funeral. And in consideration of the mine continuing to work on a day a funeral is held, the operators agree to contribute to the bereaved family, on the death of any of their workmen, one-third the amount paid by the miners, said amount not to exceed $25.00. This does not prevent friends from attending the funeral.

Rule 23—When any employe absents himself from duty two days or more, except on account of sickness, without giving advance notice to the mine boss or mine superintendent, when possible, he forfeits his position.

"When a machine runner or any employe upon whose work other employes of the mine are dependent, absents himself from duty without giving advance notice, when possible, to the mine boss, he forfeits his position.

"Rule 24—When any places on any territory are not cut and the machine runners have not worked as many hours as the mine has worked, by reason of breakdowns, sickness or absence of runners, the machine runners shall work on idle days or overtime until they have made up the lost time.

"Rule 25—In case of local or general suspension of mining, either at the expiration of this contract or otherwise, the engineers, firemen, pumpers and other men necessary to keep mines in shape, shall not suspend work, but shall, when mine is suspended, fully protect and keep in repair all of the company's property under their care, and operate fans and pumps, and lower and hoist such men or supplies as may be required to keep up steam at the company's coal plant but it is understood and agreed that the operators will not ask them to hoist any coal produced by non-union labor for sale on the market. The rates to be paid for such work to be those in effect at the time of suspension, and then subject to any subsequent settlement.

"Rule 26—The conditions, employment, duties, hours of labor, and membership in the U. M. W. of A., of the engineers, firemen, electricians and machinists existing prior to September 1, 1903, continue and remain in force during the life of this contract.

"It is further agreed that any interference on the part of any member of the U. M. W. of A., of a mine committee, or local officer with the duties of engineer, fireman, electrician or machinist, shall subject such member or members of the U. M. W. of A., of a mine committee, or local officers to suspension or dismissal by the operator, with the understanding that the engineers, firemen, electricians, or machinists, who are now members, shall remain members of the U. M. W. of A., and those who are not members shall not be compelled to join.

"Rule 27—It is understood and agreed that should any dispute arise in regard to the interpretation of the rules and provisions of this scale that the interpretation shall be left entirely to the Committee of Operators and Miners who formulated and signed this agreement.

"Rule 28—Pay days shall be uniform on the 10th and 25th of each month.

This shall be exclusive of the time required in reaching such working places in the morning and departing from same at night. Regarding drivers, they shall take their mules to and from the stables and the time required in so doing shall not include any part of the day's labor, their work beginning when they reach the change at which they receive empty cars, but in no case shall the driver's time be docked while he is waiting for such cars at the point named.

"Rule 4. That when the men go into the mine in the morning they shall be entitled to two hours' pay whether or not the mine works the full two hours. But after the first two hours the men shall be paid for every hour thereafter by the hour, for each hour's work or fraction part thereof. If for any reason the regular routine work cannot be furnished the inside labor for a portion of the first two hours, the operators may furnish other than the regular labor for the unexpired time.

"Rule 7. Operators shall take the water out of rooms and entries and have rooms and entries dry at starting time, or pay 4¾ cents per barrel if the miner has to bail it. Barrels to be placed in rooms and entries, and where barrels cannot be placed in entries, the water box shall be forwarded for the entrymen to bail water in.

"Rule 8. Prices to be paid for slate or soapstone coming down unavoidably over the coal shall be agreed upon by the mine boss and the miner, and if they fail to agree, it shall be referred to the superintendent, mine boss and mine committee.

"Rule 9. Clay veins and spars shall be paid for, the matter to be referred to miner affected and mine boss. If they fail to agree, the company reserves the right to remove the same and give the miner another place.

party upon whom the fine is imposed, object to said fine, each of them shall have the right of appeal to the sub-district president for a final ruling. In order to be honored the check-off must be furnished to the company not later than 5 p. m., on the second and seventeenth day of each month.

"Rule 14. No strike shall take place at any mine under the jurisdiction of Sub-District 5 of District No. 6 (Ohio) except for violation of agreements, or refusal of employers to pay on the regular pay day without explanation, until the grievances at the mine affected have been thoroughly investigated by the officers of District 6, U. M. W. of A., and operators interested.

In case they disagree, the miner or miners affected shall be given an average place in the mine pending a final settlement of the question in dispute, then the matter shall be referred to the Sub-District President and the Operators' Commissioner, who shall use every effort to settle the controversy, and in case they disagree, then the Sub-District President may call in one experienced miner, and the commissioner, one operator or superintendent, and the matter referred to them and their decision shall be final and binding. Said investigations and decisions shall not be delayed, but be determined at the earliest possible date.

(a) "President Lewis' Report.

Submitted to the Twenty-Second Annual Convention of the International United Mine Workers of America.

"To the Officers and Representatives of the Twenty-second Annual Convention, United Mine Workers of America:

"Fellow Mine Workers: With the opening of this, the Twenty-Second Annual Convention of the United Mine Workers of America, we are reminded that another year has come and gone in the history of our movement. We are also reminded that just twenty-one years ago there assembled in the city of Columbus, Ohio, a small but determined body of miners. The miners' representatives to that convention were determined that no longer would personal animosities be permitted to jeopardize the interests and welfare of the men who toil in and around the coal mines. As a result of their deliberations, the United Mine Workers of America was organized and embarked on its mission of bringing into one organization all the mine workers of the country.

"Those of you who remember the history of the miners' unions for several years previous to 1890, will recall that rival organizations in the mining industry had divided our forces. The rivalry that existed at that time between the two miners' unions created bitter animosities among the members and destroyed the effectiveness of either organization, to accomplish any permanent good for the mine workers. The time and energy of the members of both organizations was spent fighting each other, instead of combining their forces to resist the unjust conditions imposed on the mine workers. Is it any wonder that many miners, as well as others, were skeptical of the success of the United Mine Workers' organization at the time it was organized on January 25, 1890?

"In the twenty-one years' existence of the United Mine Workers the good judgment of the founders of our union has been fully vindicated. Our hopes and expectations have not always been realized, but an impartial review of the history of our movement will convince any one of the splendid results accomplished by the organized mine workers of the country. It is true that the United Mine Workers of America has not always been successful. It has met with its reverses and defeats as well as won its victories. But its work has brought to the membership a steady increase in wages and a permanent improvement in the working conditions of the men who are employed in the mines. We have reason to congratulate ourselves that in the thoroughly and partly organized mining States we have nearly 350,000 men who are now employed under joint agreements that provide the highest rate of wages ever paid the mine workers of the country.

"When we last met in regular annual convention we were confronted with the work of outlining a plan to extend the interstate joint movement. We were expected to adopt a policy that would provide a higher wage standard to meet the increased cost of living.

"I have always been opposed to a division of our forces in negotiating our wage contracts either in districts or with individual operators. I am a firm believer in unity of action and this must be the basis of the future success of the organization. In harmony with my position on this question, I submitted to the representatives in the last annual convention the following general recommendation in the form of a resolution:

1. That we demand an advance in wages for each and every mining district of the country.

2. That all district officers are authorized and instructed to negotiate wage agreements, but no district shall sign a contract until all wage contracts are negotiated.

3. That all mines shall continue working after the 1st of April and continue working until wage contracts are finally negotiated, provided the present rates continue until final action is determined upon.

"In the recommendation that I submitted to the convention there were three essential features. One was to the effect that we were entitled to and should receive an advance in wages. The other was to give each scale district an opportunity to negotiate the terms of wage contracts in accord with the declared policy of the International convention, but denied the right of the representatives of any district or group of districts to sign an agreement until each and every scale district in the country had completed their negotiations. The third important feature in my recommendation was to avoid a suspension of operation of the mines, by continuing to work until all wage contracts were finally negotiated.

"I firmly believed at that time and have been thoroughly convinced since, that if the proposition I submitted to the last annual convention had been adopted we would have avoided the prolonged strikes of the past year, prevented the enormous expense and secured as good if not better terms in the wage contracts which were finally negotiated and agreed upon.

"What I desire to explain at this time is that the recommendations I submitted to the last annual International convention were in perfect harmony with the position I have taken for years; i. e., that we should keep our forces united at all times; that we should not have sectional strikes or settlements, and that all contracts should be negotiated before any contracts can be signed. To make this policy effective and avoid periodical strikes, either more time must be taken to negotiate wage contracts or the mines should continue working pending the negotiation of wage agreements.

NEGOTIATIONS OF AGREEMENTS.

"The policy of the last annual convention to govern the negotiations of wage contracts included the following general propositions:

"A demand for run-of-mine system. Ten cents per ton advance in the mining rate. A uniform rate of wages for all classes of inside and outside labor with time and a half for overtime, Sundays, and holidays. An eight-hour day from 'bank to bank' and Saturday half holiday. That the contract be made for two years. That local inequalities be referred to districts affected. To adjust the new powder controversy in the Pittsburg district. No limit to amount of deductions for the organization. That no district negotiate an agreement to reimburse the operators for legislation that added cost to the production of coal. That contracts be negotiated but not signed by any district until all contracts were negotiated. That the International convention should not adjourn to reconvene in Toledo, Ohio.

"Immediately upon the adjournment of the International convention the miners' representatives of Illinois, Indiana, Ohio and western Pennsylvania went to Toledo, Ohio, to meet the operators in interstate joint convention which had been called to meet in that city.

"The interstate joint convention at Toledo, Ohio, was called to order and committees on credentials and rules of order were appointed. The credential committee disagreed, the miners' representatives insisted that the Illinois miners should be seated in the interstate joint convention with voice and vote. The operators objected to the seating of the Illinois miners' representatives in the absence of the Illinois operators. The interstate joint convention at Toledo failed to even effect a permanent organization on the single issue of seating the Illinois miners.

"My position in the Toledo joint convention was clearly defined to the operators and miners. As a firm believer in the interstate joint movement, I was unwilling to negotiate a wage contract for three states. This position was in harmony with my declarations time and again of uniting, instead of dividing our forces in an effort to extend the interstate joint movement.

"When we adjourned the convention at Toledo there was little or no prospect of negotiating wage contracts. Conferences were held in various districts but with no success. A conference was called to meet in Cincinnati, Ohio, February 23, and it was agreed to issue a call for a joint convention of the representatives of the miners and operators of Indiana, Ohio and western Pennsylvania to meet in joint convention in Cincinnati, Ohio, March 8, 1910. An invitation was also extended to the Illinois miners and operators to take part in the interstate convention but they were not present. On February 25 a call was issued for a special International convention of the United Mine Workers to meet in Cincinnati, Ohio, March 15, 1910, to take such action as necessary to protect the interests of the mine workers of the country.

"After several weeks' deliberation the interstate joint convention in Cincinnati adjourned without reaching an agreement. The special International convention at Cincinnati adopted as the basis upon which wage contracts could be negotiated the following proposition:

1. That the following is the terms on which agreements can be negotiated:

That the agreement of the present year be continued for the scale year beginning April 1, 1910, and ending March 31, 1912, with the exception of the mining prices and day wages.

That the price for mining be increased five (5) cents per ton on inch-and-a-quarter screen lump coal, pick mining in western Pennsylvania thin vein, the Hocking the basing district of Ohio, and both block and bituminous districts of Indiana; three cents per ton on mine-run coal pick mining in the bituminous district of Indiana.

That the price for machine mines be increased (4) cents per ton on screen lump coal in western Pennsylvania, thin vein, in the Hocking, the basing district of Ohio; four (4) cents per ton on screen lump coal in the block and bituminous district of Indiana, and three (3) cents per ton on mine-run coal in the bituminous district of Indiana.

This internal differences both as to prices and condition be referred for adjustment to the various districts affected, it being understood that in the adjustment of such differences there shall be no modification of the advance of wages provided for in the proposition.

The inside day wage scale shall be advanced 5.55 per cent with the conditions of the Columbus day wage scale agreement of 1898.

That all narrow, dead work and room turning and outside day labor shall be paid a proportionate advance with the pick mining rate.

2. That contracts may be negotiated and agreed upon by states, districts or groups of districts.

3. That where all the operators within one district fail to sign the terms of the proposed contract that the operators of any sub-district may agree upon the general terms of the contract.

4. That where the operators of an entire state, district or sub-district agree to pay the general advance demanded their mines may continue in operation pending the final negotiations and agreement upon the details of the wage contract in the state, district or sub-district affected.

5. That details not herein specified are referred to the International Executive Board with full power to act, except the Board is not empowered to modify in any respect the terms of the demand for an advance in wages as it applies to mining, day labor—inside and out—narrow and dead work.

6. All coal companies shall be required to sign the contract for all the mines that operate in one or more districts, unless permission is given district officials to do otherwise by the International Executive Board.

7. That in any district where new explosives are used the mines affected shall operate on a run-of-mine basis and the company shall furnish the miners with new explosives at the same relative cost as black powder.

"Immediately upon the adjournment of the Special International Convention at Cincinnati, Ohio, the following letter was sent to the presidents of the various districts where wage contracts expired on April 1, 1910:

Indianapolis, Ind., March 30, 1910.

Dear Sir and Brother—You will find inclosed a copy of the proposition adopted at the special convention at Cincinnati, yesterday evening.

You can see by this proposition that the first thing necessary to be done is to get the operators of your district together and have them agree to sign the general terms of the contract providing they want the mines to continue in operation after April 1.

According to the rules laid down by the special convention at Cincinnati, no contracts can be signed up by individual operators. This rule should be adhered to as well as the other rules embodied in the proposition adopted by the special convention.

In accordance with the policy of the United Mine Workers, any of the operators that desire to have pumpers and such other men employed as may be necessary to take care and protect the property, such men should be permitted to work providing they receive the advance in wages provided for in the enclosed proposition.

With the hope that you will be able to arrange a conference of the operators of the District immediately, I remain,

Yours very truly,

(Signed) T. L. Lewis, President, U. M. W. of A.

"This letter was sent to each of the district presidents where contracts expired in order that we would have some definite understanding in regard to negotiating contracts on the basis provided by the policy outlined at the Cincinnati Special Convention.

"On April 1 about 300,000 mine workers suspended work to enforce the demands of the Cincinnati convention."

(429) "IRWIN DISTRICT.

(b) "There has been a strike in progress in the Irwin district of Pennsylvania that has cost the International organization of the United Mine Workers $329,900 up to November 30. Inasmuch as that strike was ordered by officers of the Pittsburgh district without even consulting the International officers and without even organizing the men, I feel it my duty to give you the facts in regard to the situation in that field.

"I made the statement at the last annual convention that we had organizers in the Irwin district, in the Greensburg and other non-union sections of Pennsylvania, as well as in Maryland and West Virginia. In the early part of March I learned that President Feehan had sent district officers or organizers into the Irwin district, and on March 5 I wrote President Feehan the following letter:

> Indianapolis, Ind., March 5, 1910.
>
> Mr. Francis Feehan,
>
> President, District 5, Pittsburg, Pa.
>
> Dear Sir and Brother: You may not be aware that we have organizers in the coke regions and in the Irwin field and that both of those districts are outside of the jurisdiction of District 5.
>
> I am writing to inquire if it is true that your board members, or any of them, are working in those fields. If they are, they are interfering with our arrangements and may serio isly interfere with our plans to try and organize those fields.
>
> I am writing to suggest that you have your board members confine their efforts to the territory under the jurisdiction of District 5. There are many men in District 5 that need to be brought into the organization and they will find plenty to do.
>
> Hoping to hear from you immediately on this sub ject, I remain,
>
> Yours very truly,
>

> President, U. M. W. of A.

"I received a communication from President Feehan, dated March 7, in which he stated that the district vice-president with interpreters had been authorized to go to Greensburg on Friday, March 4, and succeeded in establishing an organization with about four hundred miners.

On March 20, while in Cincinnati, I communicated with President Feehan and stated that the Irwin district and the Connellsville coke regions would be separate districts when organized, and called his attention to the fact that a serious mistake had been committed in organizing a few men and declaring a strike in a district outside of the Pittsburg district. I received a letter from President Feehan, dated March 11, in which he stated that there was a necessity for a strike in the Irwin field, in order that the mine workers of that section could be given an opportunity to improve their working conditions. He also stated that he had made his position plain to the miners in the Irwin district, and that he did not think they expected to get any financial assistance from the International organization, and he stated that the Pittsburg District was willing to give the Irwin field men financial assistance.

"In reply to his communication, dated March 11, I sent him the following letter:

Burnett House,
Cincinnati, Ohio, March 14, 1910.

Mr. Francis Feehan, Cincinnati, Ohio:

Dear Sir and Brother: Desire to acknowledge receipt of your communication of March 11. I have read your letter very carefully and desire to state again that the Irwin district is not under the jurisdiction of District 5 and never was. It is District 3 if it was organized and the Connellsville coke regions is District 4. I am surprised that you did not know, according to your letter, that the Irwin field was no part of your district.

Any attempts to organize one mine in the Irwin field will simply jeopardize the possibility of organizing the entire district. When the International Executive Board has decided on a definite policy in regard to the situation in the Irwin field, those men will not be required to fight their battles alone.

Thanking you for the information contained in your letter, I remain,

Yours very truly,

(Signed) T. L. LEWIS,
President U. M. W. of A.

"On May 17, 1910, while the International Executive Board was in session at Indianapolis, an appeal from the secretary of the Pittsburg district was read. This appeal contained the following preamble and resolutions:

Whereas, We recognize that it is the duty of our organization to get every man who works in and around the mines to become a member of the U. M. W. of A., and

Whereas, We know that we owe it to ourselves and to our fellow workmen in the Greensburg and Irwin fields to do all in our power to bring them within the folds of our union, not only for their protection but our own; therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, the delegates to the Twenty-first Annual Convention of District No. 5, pledge our hearty cooperation and support to the striking miners in that field, and be it further

Resolved, That when the miners in the Pittsburg district resume operation that the district executive board be authorized to levy an assessment of twenty-five (25) cents per week on the membership in order to carry this strike to a successful termination, and be it further

Resolved, That we appeal to the International Executive Board to donate fifty thousand ($50,000.00) dollars to these people in order to promote the strike and extend the jurisdiction of the United Mine Workers of America, and be it further

Resolved, That the district officials appeal to officers and members of all district organizations affiliated with the U. M. W. of A. and all other trade organizations, if necessary, and urge them to send financial assistance to succeed in permanently establishing an organization and negotiating a wage scale in that field.

"In March, President Feehan expressed the opinion in his letter to me that he did not think the Irwin district mine workers expected any relief, and yet the resolutions adopted by the Pittsburg district convention requested the International Executive Board to donate fifty thousand dollars to support the men on strike in the Irwin district, and this at a time when we had over one hundred thousand members on strike through a failure to negotiate wage contracts.

"In keeping with the well-established custom and rules of the International Executive Board to investigate the merits of every appeal for financial assistance before it is endorsed, a committee of five International Board members, composed of Vice-President Hayes, Board Members Dagger, Haggerty, Powell and Smith was appointed to visit the Irwin district and learn the facts in regard to the existing conditions. The committee returned and failed to agree upon the kind of a report that should be submitted to the International Executive Board, but the majority of the committee of five recommended that the Irwin district strike be granted the moral and financial support of the International Executive Board.

"The recommendations of the majority of the committee of International Executive Board members appointed to go to the Irwin district was adopted.

"During the afternoon session of the International Executive Board, May 23, a motion was adopted to appoint a committee of five International Board members to draft a plan with reference to the Irwin strike. On May 28 the committee submitted to the International Executive Board a report that provided for the calling of a convention in the Irwin district for the purpose of forming a scale. That three International Executive Board Members, including the International Board member from District

5, be appointed to attend the convention. That the International and district officials co-operate to the fullest extent in conducting the strike and negotiating a settlement. That in the event of a conflict of authority the International Executive Board be recognized as the higher authority. That the financial relief donated by the International organization be handled through the district office. That the district secretary-treasurer furnish a statement to the International Secretary-Treasurer of the money expended. These recommendations were adopted.

"At a meeting of the International Executive Board held Friday evening, July 22, 1910, there appeared before the Board a committee representing eleven local unions in the Irwin district and presented a petition in which the International Executive Board was requested to form a district with a complete set of officers in the Irwin field, to issue orders to the engineers, firemen and other outside labor to quit work and to furnish more finance for the strike.

"The reason assigned by the committee representing the eleven local unions in the Irwin district for wanting a district formed immediately was to effect a settlement of the strike. It was stated by the committee from the Irwin district that the operators were unwilling to agree to any settlement with the officers of the Pittsburg district.

"The situation in the Irwin field was discussed from every possible phase and the following resolutions were offered and unanimously adopted:

> That a committee of three be appointed to co-operate with the officers of District 5 and the representatives of the strike district, with a view of trying to bring about a settlement of the strike in that field.
>
> That the forming of the district in the Irwin field be left in abeyance until we get a report from the committee provided for.

That the question of furnishing more money to that district be left in the hands of the resident officers.

"The reason that the International Executive Board was unwilling to form the new district immediately was that it would be additional expense to pay the district officers, as there was no per capita tax reported from any of the local unions in the Irwin district.

"In reporting the situation in the Irwin district, I have brought to your attention the fact that the mine workers of the Irwin district were involved in a strike before they were organized. The strike was declared without any preparation. It was inaugurated by the officers of the Pittsburg district without consulting the International Officers. The International organization has furnished financial assistance to the extent of $329,900 up to November 30, 1910, and since November 30, $20,000 per week has been sent. The International organization has had representatives in the Irwin district for months, not in full authority, but co-operating with the officers of the Pittsburg district and the representatives of the Irwin district to make the strike a success.

"That the Irwin district mine workers should be organized is a well-known fact; that they could have been organized without a strike is my firm belief; that the Irwin district miners made a splendid effort to win the strike after it was declared is well known to every person who is conversant with the situation. That the strike has not been a success in establishing the organization and wage contracts is due to the following reasons:

"1. The calling of a meeting of the men at one mine and declaring a strike without the men being organized.

"2. The failure to make proper preparation by organizing local unions and then calling a convention to formulate demands to be presented to the operators of the Irwin district.

"3. The failure to formulate demands to present to the operators of the Irwin district before a strike was declared.

"4. The failure of the officers of the Pittsburg district to consult the representatives of the International organization until a large number of unorganized men were on strike and in need of financial support.

"I have but briefly stated the many incidents that have taken place in connection with the Irwin district strike. I have been severely criticised by the officers of the Pittsburg district and others because I have tried to defend, in my own way, the interests of the miners. I have been made the subject of the most scurrilous abuse and I have remained silent and refused to be drawn into controversies over the Irwin strike situation. I remained silent but gave every possible assistance that the International could give in order that the miners of the Irwin district might win in their heroic struggle for justice.

"It may be a matter of information to you and for the the mine workers of the country to learn that I assisted in bringing a representative of one of the large companies in the Irwin district and President Feehan together to negotiate a settlement. In my judgment, if he had acted promptly, one thousand of the Irwin district miners would have returned to work under union wages and conditions last June. I believe that other settlements could have been effected if an agreement had been promptly made with the company mentioned. Later, I offered again to try and effect a settlement, but could not get President Feehan to agree upon any definite basis. He insisted that there should be a conference and then consider the basis of settlement.

"The Irwin district strike is still being conducted by the officers of the Pittsburg district and representatives of the International organization and the Irwin district. The production of coal in that district has reached that point where there is no hope of winning the strike under the present circumstances. The International organization is furnishing relief to support the men on strike to the extent of $20,000 per week. I have no desire and I have no right to deceive you in regard to the situation in any district. It is my duty to tell you frankly that it is a waste of money to continue the Irwin district strike under the present circumstances. In my opinion the strike in the Irwin district will be completely lost if continued under the present method of conducting that strike. The International organization is furnishing the financial support and should have complete control to perfect the interest of the miners now idle.

"Those men have been misled and deceived long enough and the International organization has contributed to their support without authority to settle the strike. Let me call your attention to a remarkable fact. It was stated to me by President Feehan in the early part of last year that a local was organized at Greensburg, Pa., March 4, and yet, according to the books at the International Office, not one cent of per capita tax or assessments have been paid by the miners of the Irwin district to the International organization."

(430) "COST OF STRIKES.

(c) "The United Mine Workers has passed through several criticial periods in its history.

"In the year 1894, with less than 20,000 members, the organization engaged in a contest of a national character.

"The outcome of that contest was a compromise and the leaders of that strike were severely criticized by those of our members who did not understand the conditions of the mining industry at that time. In the year 1897, as a result of internal strife and dissension, the organization had less than 10,000 members. Wages had reached a point where the mine workers of the country were in a condition of starvation. Desperation itself compelled the miners to engage in a national strike, and without any financial means of support the strike was declared on July 4 and brought to an end in September with a compromise on wages and an agreement to re-establish the interstate joint movement. The interstate joint convention in January, 1898, gave to the mine workers of the country an eight-hour day without a strike.

"In the year 1904, in order to avoid a national strike, the mine workers of the competitive field accepted a reduction in wages and there was very little criticism of the leaders who were directing the affairs of the organization at that time. In the year 1906 the organization was again confronted with a criticial situation and after a struggle the wage scale of 1903 was restored, but many important conditions were sacrificed that year in a number of the States, including Illinois, Ohio and the Southwest. In the year 1908, in the midst of an industrial depression that affected the entire country, the United Mine Workers was able to maintain its standard of wages and partially re-establish the interstate joint movement that had been disrupted in 1906. Last year we were convinced that we were entitled to an advance in wages and, failing to negotiate wage contracts previous to the expiration of our agreements, about 300,000 mine workers suspended work on April, 1910. Our efforts last year might have been more successful and less costly if we had avoided sectional strikes and sectional settlements.

"I have referred to those periods in the history of our movement in order that you and our members might take greater interest in the success of the organization. If you will carefully study the history of the United Mine Workers, I believe you will be convinced that strikes have not brought the greatest measure of success to our organization.

"Sectional strikes of any magnitude have been a complete failure in promoting the welfare of the United Mine Workers of America. This fact emphasizes again the necessity of changing our policy and adopting new methods that will be more effective in protecting our rights.

"I have prepared a statement, covering a period of eleven years, in which is given the amount of money paid to each district in support of mine workers who have been on strike. The period begins with 1900 and ends with the year 1910.

AMOUNT PAID TO EACH DISTRICT FOR STRIKE RELIEF.

District 1, Anthracite	$705,830.94
District 2, Central Pennsylvania	497,987.48
District 3, Irwin Field	329,900.00
District 5, Western Pennsylvania	44,016.07
District 6, Ohio	216,566.13
District 7, Anthracite	261,500.00
District 8, Indiana Block	500.00
District 9, Anthracite	501,100.00
District 10, Washington	59,500.00
District 12, Illinois	74,250.00
District 14, Kansas	122,500.00
District 15, Colorado	707,676.45

District 16, Maryland and Meyersdale	421,335.21
District 17, West Virginia	669,938.81
District 18, British Columbia	49,800.18
District 19, Tennessee	461,306.01
District 20, Alabama	1,286,031.32
District 21, Arkansas and Oklahoma	293,061.00
District 22, Wyoming	3,439.30
District 23, Kentucky	312,222.26
District 24, Michigan	7,700.00
District 25, Missouri	95,000.00
District 26, Nova Scotia	968,775.00
Total	$8,089,986.16

"In addition to the foregoing information I have also prepared another financial statement giving the amount that has been paid each year to support mine workers on strike for the same period beginning with the year 1900 and ending with the year 1910:

AMOUNT PAID OUT ANNUALLY IN SUPPORT OF STRIKES.

Year 1900	$144,462.50
Year 1901	202,202.71
Year 1902	1,834,506.53
Year 1903	301,922.44
Year 1904	1,065,435.47
Year 1905	753,626.02
Year 1906	805,599.92
Year 1907	105,045.57
Year 1908	744,897.19
Year 1909	600,267.39
Year 1910	1,532,020.42
Total	$8,089,986.16

"To the eight million dollars spent by the International organization must be added the hundreds of thousands of dollars contributed by our members to the districts and spent for the same purpose. If you will examine these two statements you will discover that where we have spent the most money, in support of strikes, is where we have the least membership.

"This information should be conclusive evidence that the strike as a method of organizing has not proven a success. I am convinced that sectional strikes will not organize the non-union mining districts of our country.

"The enormous expenditure of money and the tremendous waste of energy incident to a strike should be avoided. Our right to strike must never be surrendered, but as the strike is an industrial war measure it should be the last method resorted to in our effort to enforce any demands that we present to the mine owners.

(431) "MEMBERSHIP.

(d) "Herewith is given a table showing the average paid-up membership for each year since the formation of the United Mine Workers of America in 1890:

Year.	Members.	Year.	Members.	Year.	Members.
1890	20,912	1897	39,731	1904	251,006
1891	17,044	1898	32,902	1905	264,950
1892	19,376	1899	61,887	1906	230,667
1893	14,244	1900	115,321	1907	260,740
1894	17,628	1901	198,024	1908	252,018
1895	10,871	1902	175,367	1909	265,274
1896	9,617	1903	247,240	1910	231,392

"It is a matter of congratulation to our membership that we are able to report that we received per capita tax at the International Office on an average of 231,392 members for each month for the year ending November 30, 1910. This is especially significant when we pause to consider the large number of mine workers who were on strike and who, according to our laws, are not required to pay monthly dues.

"In the month of March, 1910, per capita tax was received from 310,744 members, the highest number in the history of the organization. That the strike affected our paying membership you can readily understand, when I call your attention to the fact that in May, 1910, we received per capita tax on but 118,811 members.

"As a further evidence that the United Mine Workers of America has lost none of its prestige, we received per capita tax at the International office in December, 1910, on 308,660 members. This is the highest number of members upon which per capita tax has been reported for any December month in the history of the organization. In my opinion we ought to be proud of this remarkable showing on the part of our members, in view of the prolonged strikes and the extra assessment of $1.00 per month that has been levied on our membership since May of last year. You know that heavy assessments have a tendency to cause a falling off in our membership.

"If the enemies of the United Mine Workers can derive any consolation from this statement of the actual condition of our union we have no objection. Let me here suggest that if these results can be secured and maintained by the organization when we have members who are doing all they can to create friction and divide our forces, what could we do if every member of the United Mine Workers was actually lending his assistance to make the organization a greater power for good. Let us try and work for the success of the United Mine Workers' Union and the welfare of the people we represent."

(432) "UNORGANIZED MINING DISTRICTS.

(e) "The all important problem confronting the United Mine Workers of America is, how can we organize the mine workers in the non-union districts and complete the work in those districts which are but partly organized? Costly and unsuccessful efforts have been made to organize the non-union districts through the medium of strikes.

"The tremendous expenditure of the funds of the organization and the failure to organize the States of the Ohio river as well as Colorado, Maryland and a large section of Pennsylvania, should prompt us to investigate the cause of the hostile attitude and the bitterness shown toward the organization by many of the operators in the States named.

"I have called attention in former reports to the fact that in West Virginia and other southern coal producing States, there is a firm conviction in the minds of a number of the operators that it is our purpose to organize the miners of those States in order to shut them out of the markets into which operators of organized districts ship coal. This is an unfortunate condition but is partly due to the action of a few of our own members in misrepresenting the facts and deceiving our members.

"During the past year I assigned International Vice-President Hayes and Board Members Farrington, Watkins and Garner to visit the Norfolk and Western district and the Fairmont region of West Virginia to investigate and report the prospects of organizing that State. The reports submitted to me verified what I have known for years—that in certain non-union districts, an organizer jeopardized his own life the instant he undertook to organize the miners.

"My experience in West Virginia and other non-union mining States prompts me to believe that we should clearly define our position with reference to those States. We should declare in the most emphatic manner that it is not our purpose to organize the non-union mining districts to curtail their coal production. We should emphasize our position that every non-union mining district of the country is entitled to an equal opportunity with every other mining district to market the product of their mines.

"Let us clearly define our position as organized mine workers. Let us then appeal to the intelligence of the operator and the miner in the non-union districts. If we desire to establish that confidence necessary to our success we should be perfectly frank in stating our position and we must be absolutely sincere in carrying into effect our declarations.

"I have stated in former conventions, and I repeat again, that the application of common sense should be the basis of a new method of extending our organization into the non-union mining districts and to establish permanent industrial peace between the mine owners and the mine workers of the country.

(433) "JOINT WAGE AGREEMENTS.

(f) "The joint conference method adopted by the operators and miners for the purpose of negotiating wage contracts has done much to establish peace in the mining industry. Whether this method is to be continued will depend entirely upon the sincerity of those who have been parties to the joint movement.

"Time and again we have declared in our conventions that differences existing between the employer and employe in the mining industry should be settled without resorting to strikes. In recent years there has been a disposition among our members to ignore the terms of the contracts under which they are employed, and to refuse to accept or be governed by the advice of their official representatives. If this condition is allowed to continue, and if there is no way by which our members can be convinced that agreements should be respected and complied with, then the joint movement will necessarily pass out of existence.

"In a number of districts there are so many rules being incorporated in our joint agreements that it is difficult for our members to understand the meaning and the application of the terms of the contract. Those rules are no doubt insisted upon by the operators in order to avoid strikes. There is so much delay in settling even trifling disputes, owing to technicalities in the rules, that our members become restless and finally become desperate at the failure of having grievances adjusted. The result is that instead of strikes being prevented, the mines are stopped in violation of the expressed terms of the agreement.

"Simplicity should be the basis of our joint agreements. A contract should be so clear and specific that there would be no trouble for any member to understand what it means. Penalties for failure to comply with the terms of wage agreements and incorporated in our contracts, should apply to the mine foreman and superintendent as well as to the miner and mine laborer.

"What are known as stampede strikes, locally or otherwise, are becoming a serious menace to the permanency of the joint movement method of arranging wage contracts. There is no excuse that should justify a suspension of the operation of the mines, especially under a contract mutually agreed to by the operators' and miners' representatives. That strikes take place at mines where a contract is in effect proves either that there is a defect in the contract itself, or that the parties to the contract were not sincere when it was negotiated.

"If we are to give stability to the joint movement we must adopt some practical method, not only to negotiate wage contracts, but to have them strictly complied with in every respect.

"The existence of the joint movement and the future well-being of the mine workers of the country depends upon what action this convention may take to restore that confidence necessary for the success of the United Mine Workers and the joint movement method of negotiating wage agreements."

(434) "RIGHT TO ORGANIZE.

(g) "In my report to the last annual convention I expressed my opinion in regard to the right of the laboring people to organize. This is a subject of such vital importance to the wage earners of the country that I deem it my duty to again emphasize the importance of insisting upon our right to organize the mine workers in every State in the Union.

"The power of co-operation and the dependency of individuals upon each other in every walk of life, we are compelled to more fully realize every day of our existence. Regardless of the tremendous impulse given to each movement through unity of purpose, there are employers of labor, and even representatives of the government, who deny that unity of action among laboring people, that they, themselves, exercise in their every day affairs.

"The employers of labor and those representatives of the government who attempt to prevent the laboring men from organizing and seek to destroy labor unions are hastening the day when the laboring people of this country will assert themselves and by the intelligent use of the franchise will take complete charge of every branch of the United States government.

"The time has come when we must bring forcibly but intelligently to the attention of the enemies of organized labor that in an era of concerted effort there is no such a thing as individual liberty. We must convince those who are attempting to destroy the labor movement that we will not be denied the right to co-operate with each other to better our condition and secure for ourselves a brighter future.

"Capital has a right to be invested through human agencies, either in dollars singly or in combination with millions of other dollars. The wage earner must be conceded the right to act singly or in conjunction with all of his fellow laborers. This is not a sentimental expression but a statement of a condition that will eventually be recognized by the nation and respected by the employers of labor, as well as men in public life. Capital and labor should co-operate and work together where it is possible for such a condition to exist. There can be no industrial peace and there can be no permanent progress for the nation where men are compelled to be subordinate to the influence of wealth."

(435) "WHY WE ORGANIZE.

(h) "The status of the miners' organization must be explained by its representatives, not from a charitable or a sympathetic standpoint. We must make it clear to the American people, and especially to the enemies of our movement, that we have our existence legally and morally as a matter of absolute right, not only the right to organize but the right to accomplish the purpose for which we are united.

"Few men today, even among the rankest enemies of labor unions, would hesitate to publicly express the opinion that the wage earners of our country have no right to form themselves into labor unions. There is a further right, the right to make the organization effective in accomplishing the purpose for which we organize or else the existence of the union is a farce.

"It is well known that as mine workers we are organized to secure fair wages, better conditions of employment, shorter hours of labor and the enactment of such laws as will provide greater safeguards and lessen the danger in the mine. In addition to this we are seeking to educate ourselves and those depending upon us. In fact, the basic principle of our movement is to make better citizens of the men who work in and around the coal mines of the country.

"When we present our claims to certain employers or mine owners we are told that we must respect individual liberty, or the right of the mine owner to do what he pleases with his own. This may sound plausible and might be considered as reasonable if every individual were permitted to do as he pleased. What we insist upon is that if our labor is needed to develop the mining industry we have a right as an individual or collectively to dictate the terms upon which we will sell our labor.

"It is unfortunate but true that there are a number of employers and men in public life who seem to forget that rights, duties and obligations are mutual. They seem to forget that every man who has become a part of the government has made a concession and surrendered certain individual rights. They seem to forget that the producers of the wealth of the country make it possible for the nation and the government to exist.

"As members of the United Mine Workers' organization we are asking for no special privilege. All we ask for is an equal opportunity before the law, and this we have a right to insist upon. Those employers of labor and those representatives of the United States government who are attempting to destroy labor unions should remember that, when driven too far, the mighty army of labor, by organized effort and the intelligent use of the ballot, can remove from public office the enemies of the people, and can destroy the power of the coprorations and make them harmless as a factor to enslave the wealth producers of our country."

(436) "SHERMAN ANTI-TRUST LAW.

(i) "We have in this country a law known as the Sherman anti-trust law. Its alleged object is to destroy trusts and to prohibit combinations that are inimical to the interest of the people.

"We have no knowledge that the great industrial corporations have been limited in their authority to control certain commodities. There is no likelihood that the Standard Oil Company, the United States Steel Corporation and other great industrial institutions will be dissolved by the enforcement of the provisions of the Sherman anti-trust law.

"This law, like others enacted for the alleged purpose of protecting the rights of the people, is in reality being used to deprive the wage earners of the right to organize. We know that the Sherman anti-trust law, as well as many similar State laws, are being used to keep the mining industry from being elevated to a higher standard.

"In my opinion the Sherman anti-trust law and every other law of a similar character, should be either amended or repealed, and instead of attempting to regulate corporations and trusts in the manner provided by the Sherman law, the national and State governments should enact laws providing for a method of taxation that would remove any incentive for large corporations to accumulate wealth by illegitimate methods.

"As laboring men, and especially as mine workers, we should lend every influence we possess to repeal those provisions of the Sherman law that deprive us of our right to organize and establish the object for which we are united. Now is the time to act as we may at any time be made the victims of a law that was enacted to control trusts but which is being diverted to destroy organized labor."

(437) "WESTERN FEDERATION OF MINERS.

(j) "Our last Annual Convention clearly defined the attitude of the United Mine Workers of America toward our fellow workers who are members of the Western Federation of Miners.

"By a unanimous vote of our last International Convention we adopted the following:

1. We recommend that at some time in the future there shall be a complete solidification of the organized forces now enlisted under the names of Western Federation of Miners and the United Mine Workers of America.

2. That we declare in favor of continuing the present agreement of a mutual exchange of transfer cards.

3. We favor co-operation of the organizers of the two unions in organizing the non-union coal miners and metal miners in every section of the American continent.

4. We recommend to the Western Federation of Miners that they make application for affiliation with the American Federation of Labor, on condition that the present jurisdiction of the Western Federation of Miners and United Mine Workers will be recognized by the Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor.

5. We declare in favor of forming a mining department under the jurisdiction of the American Federation of Labor to control the mining industry of the American continent, along similar lines to those departments which are now organized under the jurisdiction of the American Federation of Labor.

6. In the event that this general outline is ratified by representatives of the United Mine Workers of America and the Western Federation of Miners, either in convention or by a referendum vote, all details to bring about a better working alliance to be referred to the International Executive Boards of the Western Federation of Miners and the United Mine Workers of America.

7. That whatever agreement this joint committee may reach is tentative and not binding on either organization, but subject to the action of each organization, either of whom has the right to accept, reject or modify this proposition, and nothing shall be binding on either organization, unless ratified by both.

"This general proposition was ratified by the members of the Western Federation of Miners. Representatives of the United Mine Workers of America and representatives of the Western Federation of Miners met in Washington, D. C., with the Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor to arrange the granting of a charter. A conference of representatives of the United Mine Workers and the Western Federation of Miners together with representatives of the Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor, held another conference in Indianapolis to agree upon the granting of a charter to the Western Federation of Miners, but without success.

"The United Mine Workers' delegation to the Convention of the American Federation of Labor at St. Louis introduced the following resolution:

> Whereas, The Western Federation of Miners have applied for a charter of affiliation to the American Federation of Labor, with similar jurisdiction to be accorded to them that is now accorded to the United Mine Workers of America.
> Whereas, We believe that the Western Federation of Miners should be affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, and accorded the same rights and privileges as the United Mine Workers of America in their jurisdiction of men working in and around the mines, to be organized under the Western Federation of Miners.

> Resolved, That it is the sense of the delegates representing the Thirtieth Annual Convention of the American Federation of Labor that the Western Federation of Miners should be granted a charter of affiliation, with jurisdiction of employes working in and around the metalliferous mines under their present organization and that the officers and Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor are hereby instructed to issue to the Western Federation of Miners a charter of affiliation with the American Federation of Labor on that basis. On behalf of the United Mine Workers of America.

"The resolution, together with the report of the Executive Council, was referred to a special committee which reported to the Convention of the American Federation of Labor, recommending that a charter be granted to the Western Federation of Miners with a limited jurisdiction.

"It is to be regretted that, owing to technical objections of representatives who believe strictly in the trade idea of labor unions, a charter of affiliation with the American Federation of Labor was not granted to the Western Federation of Miners.

"I am still of the opinion that a charter should be granted to the Western Federation of Miners, giving to them similar jurisdiction over the men working in and around the metalliferous mines as has been conceded to the United Mine Workers of America. We should renew our efforts and determination to do everything within our power to secure a charter for the Western Federation of Miners. We should form a closer alliance in order that all the mine workers on the American Continent may finally be enrolled in one Union, fighting in a common cause for the industrial emancipation of the mine workers of the world."

Koch's Exhibit No. 6.

A printed paper having attached to it a typewritten sheet of paper; the paper has upon it the following heading: "Official Mine Scale between the Operators and United Mine Workers of America, for the Panhandle District of West Virginia. All persons accepting employment in this mine hereby agree to be governed by the following rules and regulations. In effect April 1, 1904, and ending March 31, 1906." The typewritten sheet attached to the printed paper just identified has the following heading: "The following local rules are made as a part of the Panhandle scale of W. Va., as adopted for the period April 30, 1904, to March 31, 1906, and are to be recognized as such by both operator and miners interested." And immediately following that heading are four short rules, which read as follows:

"Rule 1. The check weighman, if possible, must be an employee of the company, but should he be chosen from the outside, he must not be objectionable to the company.

"Rule 2. Day labor is allowed to work overtime and to be paid scale price for such overtime. This to be done without any recess between the end of the eight-hour day and the overtime.

"Rule 3. Enough men to report for work and work on holidays, Sundays and days on which a death by accident to an employee might occur, to keep fuel supplied for engines.

"Rule 4. Work shall begin at seven o'clock a. m.; work until eleven o'clock; one hour for dinner and work from twelve m. until four o'clock p. m., eastern standard time."

At the foot of that paper and the language, "Signed and agreed to on behalf of the company," is the signature, "W. H. Koch." On the other side of the same sheet of paper, and opposite the signature of W. H. Koch, and under the heading, "Signed and agreed to on behalf of the miners," are the signatures, "James Jarrett, Walter Miller, S. P. Rowand, James Conoway."

Koch's Exhibit No. 7.

A printed paper purporting to be a mine scale between the employees of the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company, and the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company, in effect April 1, 1906, and ending March 31, 1908, and having also at the head, in writing, these words: "All persons accepting employment at the mine hereby agree to be governed by the following rules and regulations." The paper has some modifications of the printed scale by marking in ink of certain figures opposite the printed figures, indicative of the price to be paid for the particular service, and it has crossed out in ink the following language: "Rule 9. We adopt the check-off system as a part of the agreement in this district. This pertains to regular dues and assessments of the U. M. W. of A., but shall not give any right to collect fines unless such fines are ordered by two-thirds of the members of the local union. However, should either the operator, or local union, or the party upon whom the fine is imposed object to said fine, each of them shall have the right of appeal to the sub-district president for a final ruling. Check-off lists shall be handed in at my office not later than 5 p. m., on the 2d and 17th days of each month; otherwise, operators shall not be required to check off same." In addition to having that rule I have just quoted and which is printed, stricken out in ink, the following rule, No. 10, is also stricken out in ink. "Rule No. 10. No strike shall take place at any mine under the jurisdiction of Sub-District 5 of District 6, except for specific violation of agreement. That is, screens irregular; failure to pay on pay day without explanation; violation of mining laws by operators, or reduction from scale wages, until the grievance of the mine affected has been thoroughly investigated by the officers of District 6, U. M. W. of A., and operators interested. Any man or men that cause a stoppage of work at any time in violation of this rule, shall be subject to dismissal at the will of the company." In addition to this rule, No. 10, last referred to as being stricken out in ink, the third paragraph of Rule No. 19 is stricken out in ink. That paragraph reads as follows: "Miner so suspended shall have the right of appeal to officials U. M. W. of A., and operators interested;" and in addition to having that third paragraph of Rule No. 19 stricken out, Rule No. 22 is stricken out in ink. Rule No. 22 reads as follows: "Mines to be placed on a screen basis; run of mine to be paid for on an average of each man's screened coal per day. The price of run of mine from Boggs Run mine shall be 61 cents per car." And in addition to having Rule No. 22, as above, stricken out in ink, Rule No. 25 is also stricken out in ink. Rule No. 25 reads: "No new rule, either local nor general, shall be permitted unless mutually agreed upon by operators and miners interested." Attached to this printed scale is a slip of paper upon which is written: "Rule 22. Run of mine coal used at bin to be paid for at the rate of (32⅓) thirty-two and one-third cents per ton, r. of m." This printed scale has attached to it for the purpose of signature a piece of paper upon which is written: "Hitchman Coal & Coke Company, W. H. Koch, Manager."

HITCHMAN MINE, FACTS ABOUT.

(a) When and why opened, 1902.
By whom opened.
Designed primarily to supply coal to the B. & O. R. R. engines at its yards at Benwood, W. Va., four miles below Wheeling, for which trade a contract was made before the mine was opened. Such coal is termed "Engine Coal."
Secondarily, the mine was designed to ship coal to the general markets, local and otherwise, as its production became great enough in the course of its development to admit of that trade. Such coal is termed "Commercial Coal."

One of the objects of the U. M. (c) During the spring of 1903 and prior to April 1, 1903, the Hitchman mine was operated "non-union" and Hitchman himself was spending the most of his time running the Mount Pleasant mine in Ohio.

These defendants, Lewis, Sullivan, Savage, Watkins, and Rankin, officers of the United Mine Workers, with whom Hitchman dealt regarding the Mount Pleasant mine, threatened to close down the Mount Pleasant mine unless the management would unionize the Hitchman mine.

So the Hitchman mine was unionized April, 1903, resultant upon that threat, and then there was a strike and the Hitchman mine was idle for 51 days.

EXCERPTS FROM ORIGINAL DOCUMENTS TRANSMITTED TO THIS COURT NOT IN PRINTED RECORD.

Excerpts from Book entitled "Proceedings of Joint Conference of Coal Operators and Coal Miners of Western Pennsylvania, Ohio and Indiana, Cincinnati, Ohio, March 8-29, 1910."

This book is otherwise known in the record of the case of the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company against John Mitchell and others as McKinley's Exhibit No. 4 and as Upstill's Exhibit No. 1. [Record pp. 706, 291, 484, 485.]

(1) "It may be fitting to say at this time, before we proceed with the organization of the convention, to our friends who are here as visitors, to the men in public life and to the great American people through the press representatives who are here, that the eyes of the United States are focused on Cincinnati this week. We have assembled here as representatives of one of the most important industries in the country. We have come here for the purpose of negotiating a wage contract that will directly and indirectly affect half a million men who are wage earners in the coal mines of this country. We have come here for the purpose of negotiating a wage contract to govern an industry whose value cannot be counted in millions, but in hundreds of millions in actual money value. We are here to negotiate a contract the importance of which is second to no other in this country. Every wheel of industry, whether in the mill or the factory or on our transportation lines, revolves as a direct result of the commodity we produce as mine workers, and the commodity the operators are responsible for placing on the market."

Chairman Lewis.
p. 6, l. 48–50.
p. 7, l. 1–15.

(2) "The joint movement may have its defects; it has its good qualities, and if there are any imperfections in it let us work to remedy them. There is one thing to be said for this joint movement, and that is that to our minds it is the most practical solution of the labor problem we have yet discovered. There may be another solution, there may be another time when we will find something more practical than the method we have adopted in the mining industry; but I am unwilling to give this method up and go to work and experiment with another at this time. In other words, I am from Missouri temporarily, and I must not only be shown, but I must be convinced that there is some other method more practical than this before I am willing to surrender this method for another.

"Let us express the hope that when we leave Cincinnati it will be with an agreement that will be reasonably satisfactory to all concerned, and that it will mean industrial peace in the mining industry of our country for two years from April 1, 1910."

Chairman Lewis.
p. 8, l. 1–17.

(3) "Upon the reconvening of the session Mr. Savage, secretary of the Committee on Credentials, reported as follows:

"The report of the committee is not written out, but we are ready to make a verbal report. The full report will be prepared for the two secretaries. The committee organized and elected Mr. P. H. Penna, chairman, and G. W. Savage, secretary. A motion was made that the accredited representatives of Western Pennsylvania, operators and miners; the accredited representatives of Ohio, operators and miners, and the accredited representatives of Indiana, operators and miners, be seated in this convention. That was carried by unanimous vote. Another motion was made that the national officers of the United Mine Workers and the Executive Board members and the Secretaries and Commissioners of the Operators' Associations be seated in the convention.

"Mr. Zerbe, Ohio: That they be seated as ex-officio members.

"Mr. Savage: As ex-officio members. We find the approximate number of delegates as follows: Western Pennsylvania, operators 25, miners 140; Ohio, operators 48, miners 140; Indiana Bituminous, operators 25, miners 90; Indiana Block, operators 2, miners 10.

"On motion the report of the committee was adopted."

p. 10, l. 1–22.

(4) "Fourth. That each state be allowed the same number of votes on the floor of the house—four votes on behalf of the operators and four votes on behalf of the miners in each State.

"Fifth. That no vote be declared carried unless upon the affirmative vote of the miners and operators of each State. That upon all questions of mere procedure the ordinary rules of parliamentary procedure, as stated in any standard manual, shall be the rules of this convention; and that in no event shall the rule requiring unanimous vote on all main and principal questions be suspended. Main and principal questions mean all questions affecting the proposed scale and agreement."

Mr. Dagger, secretary of the Committee on Rules and Order of Business and Permanent Organization—under "RULES."

p. 10, l. 39–46.
p. 11, l. 1–3.

(5) Mr. Lewis, for the miners and representatives, presented the following proposition:

MINERS PROPOSITION

"We, the representatives of the United Mine Workers, present to the Operators for their consideration the following proposition:

"1. That all coal be weighed before being screened and paid for on that basis. The mine-run rate in the different districts shall be at least equivalent to the screen coal prices.

"2. An advance of ten (10) cents per ton for pick mining and an equivalent advance for machine mining and a corresponding increase for all day work, dead work, yardage, etc.

"3. That we demand a uniform rate of wages for all classes of inside and outside day labor. Time and a half for overtime, Sundays and legal holidays.

"4. A change in the present eight hour day work day so as to provide for eight hours from starting time until quitting time, or what is commonly known as from 'bank to bank,' with a half holiday on Saturday.

"5. That the contract period shall be for two years from April 1, 1910.

"6. That all local inequalities and internal differences, both as to prices and conditions, be referred to the districts affected.

"7. That the International officials require all coal companies in the Pittsburg District, where new explosives have been introduced, to comply with all the terms of settlement made with the Charleroi Coal Company and the officials of our organization on the explosive question, by either paying the miners on run-of-mine basis, or granting an increase of $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent to miners working in wide rooms and 9 per cent in narrow rooms, and that the miners be furnished the new explosives at the same relative cost as black powder, which was formerly used, and where shot-firers are employed the company shall pay their wages, and that the International officers give the matter immediate attention.

"8. There shall be no limit to the amount of deductions for the organization.

"9. That no district under the control of the United Mine Workers be permitted to enter into an agreement to reimburse the operators for any money expended for labor, directly or indirectly, wherein the law says the expense shall be borne by the operators.

"Mr. Lewis: We are ready to hear from the operators."

p. 15, l. 34–42.
p. 16, l. 1–34.

(6) "Mr. Maurer, Ohio, read the following statement:

"The answer of the operators to the proposition of the miners, in order to be thoroughly understood, makes it necessary to recall the history of wage agreements, and trace with brevity the conditions under which we have from time to time met as operators and miners and effected such agreements, so as to show connectedly the factors which have controlled both parties up to the present time.

"In the years prior to any substantial agreement the conditions of the mining industry were very unsatisfactory in their influence upon both the operators of mines and the miners in the various competitive districts. A remedy for this state of chaos was earnestly sought by both parties and resulted in the early '80's in agreements between the operators and miners of Western Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana and Illinois. In 1886 the institution of contracts between miners and operators was effected. These contracts operated with varying degrees of success and failure for some years and until about the year 1894, when these relations were dissolved. The conditions again took on an aspect of demoralization, which continued with varying degrees of intensity, numerous strikes, lockouts and consequent loss in wages and profits and sometimes injuries to property, until in the year 1898.

"During this period the conditions were such, both as to the price received for coal by operators and the price paid to the miners, that it became imperative for the interests of each to re-establish in some form the former agreements. At this time the basing price of the Hocking district was 56 cents per ton for screened lump coal. For a short time immediately preceding that year, the mining rate was 51 cents. The working hours in the districts, parties to the early agreements, were from nine and a half to ten hours per day.

"The chief evil was the fact that districts which did not recognize the United Mine Workers and had no agreements with them produced coal much more cheaply than those districts which sustained contractual relations with that organization. Some of the more important factors influencing these conditions were different methods of producing coal, varying costs of mining, different hours of labor, different sized screens, not mentioning various other elements.

"In order to correct these most harmful conditions a joint convention of operators and miners of Western Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana and Illinois, at the solicitation of the miners officials, was called to meet at Chicago in January, 1898. At this convention an interstate joint agreement was established. After a long session of deliberation and negotiation, continuing over a period of about three weeks, the basing price for mining in Ohio and Pennsylvania was increased from 56 to 66 cents per ton, an advance of practically 18 per cent, and both the existing price and method of screening and weighing of coal was made uniform throughout the entire territory covered by the terms of the contract. As a result of the Chicago convention a representative meeting was subsequently held at Columbus, at which a uniform day-wage scale was established for inside labor. All of these concessions made by the operators were of substantial benefit to the miners.

"In addition to the advance in the price of mining and the other important concessions enumerated, the action of this convention had an effect of the most far-reaching and salutary character, not alone for the mine workers but for the entire labor world, in the recognition of eight hours as constituting a day's labor, this being the first recognition of the eight-hour day by any large body of employers in the United States.

"The granting of the eight-hour day by the operators, after making these numerous other important concessions, was with the distinct understanding and explicit promise of the miners to give to the operators of the four contracting states adequate protection against the competition of the unorganized fields. From year to year they have been called upon to fulfill that promise.

"The operators, parties to that agreement, at the time of its execution felt that it was absolutely necessary to the safety of their investments that they be protected from the encroachments upon them by their competitors of the unorganized fields. The tonnage of the non-union fields entering into the competitive market, particularly of West Virginia and Kentucky, at that time was not so large, as it was aggressive and threatening, the total tonnage entering directly into competition from those fields being approximately 600,000 tons. Since, however, coal from this unorganized territory coming into direct competition with Ohio and Pennsylvania has so increased that a fair estimate places this competitive tonnage at 8,000,000 tons, which does not include the tonnage from non-union fields adjacent to the Pittsburg district. The markets in western and northern Ohio, eastern Indiana, and Michigan, from year to year have been encroached upon by coal from the unorganized districts until at the present time nearly 50 per cent of the coal consumed in these markets is supplied from fields operated with non-union labor. To find a market for the union tonnage displaced in the territory named, the mine owners of Ohio and Pennsylvania within the past five years, have made heavy investments and built and equipped large coal docks to secure the markets at the upper lake ports; but these operators now find the non-union coal rapidly commanding a heavy percentage of this market, when, at the time of the Chicago agreement the non-union fields had but a small fraction of this trade, and unless these conditions are corrected the markets so secured will soon be replaced by the tonnage from West Virginia and Kentucky.

"Though in the very heart of the consuming territory, on account of the wide difference between the price of labor in the organized fields of Ohio and Pennsylvania and the unorganized fields of West Virginia, Kentucky and the fields adjacent to the Pittsburg district, Ohio and western Pennsylvania are rapidly losing the markets at their very doors.

"It is evident to any candid observer that such unfair conditions should not be imposed upon the operators and miners of the unionized territory. That the interests of operators and miners are mutual in every respect does not admit of controversy. Each is equally concerned in rescuing this business from its present peril."

p. 16, l. 45–48.
p. 17, l. 1–50.
p. 18, l. 1–51.
p. 19, l. 1–4.

(7) "Finally, we ask for the fulfillment of the pledge of 1898 upon which we made to the miners so many important and costly concessions. Though that promise has not been kept, we have continued for twelve years to make additional concessions by increasing the mining price from 66 cents agreed upon at that time to 90 cents, and in other respects conceding demands without any compensating concessions upon the part of the miners, until we now find ourselves at the limit of financial safety. The operators can make no further concessions. It is now, in our view, not only to the interest of the miners, but their duty as well, to do their share to meet these conditions.

"It has been set forth as the controlling reason for an increased price for mining that the cost of living has increased during the past few years. Is it not fair, equitable or reasonable to believe that by making conditions in all competing districts equal, the districts which are parties to this agreement will benefit by a larger number of days employment, and thus the earning capacity of the miners of our district be largely increased?

"We believe this to be a true statement of facts, and therefore call upon you to relieve us as well as yourselves from the unfortunate situation in which we now find ourselves, due to the failure of the miners' organization to keep the faith pledged at Chicago in 1898.

"We therefore insist that your organization place the districts, parties to this agreement, on the same relative basis as the unorganized districts with which we are compelled to compete."

p. 20, l. 17–42.

(8) "The Hocking District of Ohio is the basing point for this state, and if we were to accept unchallenged the statement made by our friend, Mr. Maurer, in behalf of the operators, the impression would naturally go out that the miners of this country have had their wages advanced from 56 cents a ton in 1897 to 90 cents a ton in the past two years. Let your minds go back to another period in the Hocking District, the winter of 1880, or the fall of 1879, if we must go into history. The miners of the Hocking District received for their labor as miners 60 cents a ton, 75 cents a ton, a dollar a ton, and then back to 80 cents a ton inside of two months. Market conditions caused the fluctuation, and the ability of the miners at that time to take advantage of the market conditions. That was only a temporary arrangement, but from that arrangement was established the mining rate in the Hocking District of 80 cents a ton in the winter and 70 cents a ton in the summer, and that continued year after year until 1884 when the operators of the Hocking District conceived the idea of going into a movement to reduce our wages, and after a strike of eleven months we got a beautiful trouncing at the hands of the operators. Our wages went away down, so far down that neither the miners or the operators could live or make a profit. Out of that condition, which was demoralizing to all, grew the Interstate movement of 1886. That continued, as stated by Mr. Maurer, until 1894, when the operators of the country again concluded they could do better business by running the business themselves, and we had a contest. The result was that it was settled by a compromise and everybody tried to do business the best they could until 1897. The methods of doing business 'as best they could' created another sliding scale. That scale carried with it the sliding of men's wages from one point to another until we struck not 56 cents, but 45 cents in the Hocking District, 51 cents in Eastern Ohio, and different rates all over the country. Then the operators awakened to the fact that they were going into bankruptcy, and we awakened to the fact that we were headed for the poor houses. We engaged in another contest in 1897 and as a result of that contest a compromise was effected, and this present interstate joint movement was re-established."

Mr. Lewis.
p. 21, l. 4–40.

(9) "I don't know whether or not all the business that transpired at Chicago was simply and purely a mutuality. I am not prepared to admit that it was. It was more a question of bargain and sale, we selling our labor at the most favorable conditions we could get you to agree with us upon, and you seeking to buy our labor at the most favorable terms you could induce us to believe you could pay for the labor you purchased."

Mr. Lewis.
p. 22, l. 17–23.

(10) "So far as establishing other conditions at Chicago is concerned, we endeavored to establish a uniform mining rate, at least in the basing points in the several competitive fields, namely, the thin vein district of Western Pennsylvania, the Hocking District of Ohio, the Bituminous District of Indiana, and the Danville District of Illinois."

Mr. Lewis.
p. 22, l. 50, 51.
p. 23, l. 1–4.

(11) "One delegation of operators and miners is absent from this meeting. That is Illinois, and the operators and miners of that state are absent because they say while they are on the outside they will not come back until we agree to grant them relief, and relief is a peculiar word unless you have it interpreted. I have endeavored to get from the Illinois operators what they mean by relief, just the same as we endeavored to get from some Ohio operators last year what they meant by relief from the present situation. It sounds all right to make the statement. So far as our friends in Illinois are concerned, I said to the official representatives of the operators, 'Come into this movement, and join with us; present all the questions that you want relief from, and we will present a few to you that we want relief from in Illinois, and we will count noses to see who is right and who is wrong.' They are not here."

Mr. Lewis.
p. 23, l. 14–28.

(12) "The real facts are that the operators from Western Pennsylvania and Ohio that are going into the districts the operators complain of resort to the same tactics as the West Virginia operators do to keep the United Mine Workers out of that field."

Mr. Lewis.
p. 23, l. 50, 51.
p. 24, l. 1–3.

(13) "It is not a question with us of seeing how cheap we can work, and it is not a question with you of giving your coal away."

Mr. Lewis.
p. 24, l. 30–32.

(14) "If I have a proper conception of this movement it means the uplifting of the industry. If I have a proper conception of this movement, it does not mean that either operators or miners can publicly say, 'We will organize West Virginia in order that the miners of Ohio or Indiana can get more work.' That has done more to prevent the organization of West Virginia than anything I know of. Coupled with that is the attitude of Ohio and Western Pennsylvania, probably of Indiana, and I know of some Illinois operators who have gone to West Virginia and have built human fences around their properties. I mean by that that they surround their properties with pickets, men who, even when the organizers of the United Mine Workers want to walk along a county or township road passing through the properties, is met at the property line and compelled to state what his business is before he can walk on the public highway. Men will say that that is not possible in a free country, but I say it is possible. It is possible in some mining districts in this country, and I believe they are in the United States because they are in West Virginia, Kentucky, Tennessee, Alabama and a few places in Pennsylvania."

Mr. Lewis.
p. 24, l. 37–51.
p. 25, l. 1–5.

(15) "It would be interesting for the American public to know how much coal from the screened coal mines is sold as mine run notwithstanding the fact that it is mined and paid for on the screened coal basis. It is hardly necessary to go into a discussion of that, because everybody who understands the mining situation knows that the steam trade of this country is a mine-run proposition. Go wherever you will in Ohio and see the engines coaled at the mines, and you will discover that where the coal is run over the screen and the nut and slack coal run through it is all put back into the bins and put on the engine tender. Of course the operators will tell us—and I do not want to make their arguments either, by the way—that they are paying the equivalent of mine-run when they are paying on a screened coal basis at the present price. We are willing to admit that it was sought to fix the equivalents on that basis, but in order that there will be no argument about the equivalent we are ready to wipe out the screened coal basis, wipe out your equivalents, and go on the run of mine basis in order that there may be no argument about that."

p. 25, l. 31–49.

(16) "There is another reason and we all recognize the force of it. If the operators of this country are not willing to get together to get living profits on their investments the mine workers of this country are not responsible, and we are not going to be parties to a condition that keeps us down to a point where we cannot meet our honest obligations and pay our debts out of the wages we receive for our labor. We want to say, and we say it kindly but positively to the gentlemen on the other side of the house, 'Get together and organize, not only in Ohio and West Virginia—and I know a lot of you have influence enough over there, if you do as much work as we do to organize them."

Mr. Lewis.
p. 26, l. 20–30.

(17) "Our third demand was for a uniform rate of wages for all classes of inside and outside labor, and time and a half for overtime, Sundays and holidays. Why do we want uniform wages for different classes of outside labor? What do we mean by uniformity? We have, generally speaking, a uniform scale for inside day labor of different classes, but for outside labor we haven't. We are unwilling to see one operator operate his mine and pay a dumper a certain rate of wages, and another operator who is his competitor in an organized district, selling his coal in the same market, pay a dumper in a mine of the same capacity a less price for his labor. What is true of the dumper is true of the engineer, the trimmer, and all the men who work on the outside of the mine."

Mr. Lewis.
p. 26, l. 31–43.

(18) "Our eighth proposition is 'that there shall be no limit to the amount of deductions for the organization.' We mean by that that there shall be no restriction on the amount of deduction we ask from our wages to turn over to our organization. It is true that in some of the districts there is no limitation, but in other districts there is a limitation. And while I am not one of those people who believe in organizing West Virginia to close up their mines, I am one of those people who believe in organizing West Virginia in order that the operators of the Central Competitive Field as well as West Virginia operators can get better returns on their investments, and in order that we can get better returns for our labor. If we are unable to get the operators to co-operate, to get the West Virginia operators to come into the joint movement, as was originally intended in Chicago, the only other method we have is to spend our money to organize that state and enable the operators to do business."

Mr. Lewis.
p. 27, l. 49–51.
p. 28, l. 1–13.

(19) "I believe every man sitting here today will admit that this method of settling our differences has been mutually advantageous; that it has worked for the good of the industry and has provided the best way of arranging our wage contracts. As a result of it improved conditions of employment and increased wages have come to the miners, and I believe better returns on their investments have come to the gentlemen on the other side of the house. I believe it was the method by which the coal industry was put on a paying and profitable basis. I do not think any man here wishes to resort to the old method, and I do not believe there is an operator in the Central Competitive Field who has a contract with the United Mine Workers of America who would want to resort to the old method that brought about such bitter experiences and such unprofitable returns."

Mr. Green.
p. 29, l. 28–41.

(20) "Our friend, Mr. Maurer, in the well prepared statement he has submitted to this convention, referred to an obligation he claims was assumed by the United Mine Workers of America in the meeting at Chicago in 1898. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, we agreed that to a certain extent that was right; but I do not believe it was ever understood that one party to this contract was obligated exclusively to carry out that promise. I believe it was intended to be a mutual understanding and that both sides would co-operate in trying to organize West Virginia and other non-union districts in order to extend this businesslike basis of adjusting our differences to those fields.

"Let me point to the fact that the United Mine Workers of America have diligently and aggressively attempted to carry out the promise made in Chicago in 1898; that they have done everything in their power to redeem any promise they may have made to organize West Virginia. Since 1898 our organization has at various times spent hundreds of thousands of dollars trying to unionize West Virginia. We have also sacrificed human life in the attempt to redeem that promise. In view of the fact that we have spent hundreds of thousands of dollars and that our organizers, our members who have gone there as missionaries in an attempt to redeem that promise have sacrificed their lives and their liberties, we should be given credit for what we have done. I want to ask the operators how much money they have spent and what they have done to aid us to organize West Virginia.

"Is the fact that we have spent hundreds of thousands of dollars appropriated from the small earnings of our people in the Central Competitive Field, and the fact that we have sacrificed the liberty of some of our members any evidence that we have tried to redeem that promise? Does not that show that we have honestly, sincerely and diligently attempted to redeem it? I believe, gentlemen, that if the operators had done one-half as much as the miners have done, if they had even co-operated with us in what we have done, West Virginia would be organized and the operators and miners of that state would be here today participating in this joint movement."

Mr. Green.
p. 29, l. 47–51.
p. 30, l. 1–31.

(21) "You on the one side have had your price of labor to consider; we have had the cost of transportation of your coal to market, where it is brought into competition with the product of other interests to consider. During this period of time your wages have remained the same; but the price of coal and the opportunity to market it from the districts of Western Pennsylvania and Ohio have been reduced. It is admitted by your president that the increase from competitive states has been much greater than the increase from other states that are recognized in this convention today."

Mr. W. P. Murray, Ohio.
p. 36, l. 1–5.

(22) "We are unwilling that the non-union operators and miners of West Virginia or of any other coal field shall set the standard of prices and the standard of living for the intelligent operators and miners engaged in the mining industry in the states that are represented here. I believe that is the honest opinion of all of the operators who are present. It is unnecessary for me to refer to the fact that many of the operators who are represented here in this joint conference have interests in West Virginia and in other non-union coal fields whose products are going into the markets they are complaining of. It is true that they have contributed, with the other operators who are engaged in the industry in those states and districts, to keep the organization from obtaining a hold or becoming a factor in the industry in those fields of which they complain. If they will withdraw their objections to the establishment of the organization in those fields, I am sure they would not be confronted with those conditions, and we would be able to remove the evil in a very brief time. The practices resorted to by the non-union operators of West Virginia are un-American."

Mr. Feehan, Pennsylvania.
p. 42, l. 32–51.

(23) "If we were regulating the selling price of the product, I am sure we would not trouble the operators with our demands, but we would immediately force the consumer to pay an amount for coal that would allow those who produce it to live as respectable American working men should live."

Mr. Feehan.
p. 43, l. 10–15.

(24) "but I do propose to discuss that upon which every wage agreement must be made, and that is the best price that can be secured for the commodity you produce. A wage scale can be based on no other foundation."

Mr. Maurer, Ohio.
p. 44, l. 35–39.

(25) "To a greater or lesser extent these agreements become in the end a partnership."

Mr. Maurer, Ohio.
p. 44, l. 42–44.

(26) "We have a condition confronting this convention as grave as confronted the convention that met in Chicago in 1898. We have this great tonnage from the unorganized fields of West Virginia and Kentucky that is absolutely taking away from us our markets and taking away the employment which belongs to you. It is a condition that not one of us must meet, but that both of us must meet, not only for our protection but for your protection as well. The cost of living is only incident to it, and the mine-run basis is only incident to it. Every man who swings the pick will agree with me that we can pay you no more for mining coal than we can get for the product of your labor. And I am going to put up to you, I am willing to concede to this convention that West Virginia is not organized; that for ten or twelve long years the miners have done everything in their power to organize that field, and that they did it diligently and earnestly is admitted, nevertheless that field today is unorganized. Nobody is to blame. Neither the operator nor the miner is to blame for that condition; but it is a condition that we must meet and each one bear his share of the burden. Eight million tons of the coal from that unorganized state is today taking away from you the product of your labor, and taking away from the operator every cent of profit he ever had in the business. You cannot correct that. You may say to us, 'You must get together and agree upon prices; you must get the West Virginia operators in and agree upon a price.' Why, every man who stands here knows that if the operators in the State of Ohio attempt it they do so in violation of the Valentine law and that the penitentiary stares them in the face. Every miner here knows that if in the States of Ohio and West Virginia the operators were to attempt anything of the kind, they would violate, not only the Valentine law of Ohio, but they would violate the Sherman Anti-trust Law. It is easy to tell us what to do, but you should also tell us how to do it. Does any miner here believe that the operators of the State of Ohio have not tried to get the best price they can for their commodity? We have some interest in our business, we have our money invested in it, and I assure you that for two years the miners and the railroads have got every cent there was in it, and more too."

Mr. Maurer, Ohio.
p. 45, l. 3–40.

(27) "However, we stayed in the market, we gave you employment. Now, it is up to the miners of this state to meet those conditions and bear their share of that burden. I want to tell you here that if the miners of the State of Ohio insist on an increased price of their coal they will lose every bit of business they have on the Great Lakes. You have already lost your commercial business. Who supplies Michigan today with commercial coal? Who supplies Detroit? Who supplies Toledo? Who supplies Marion? Who supplies Columbus, right in the heart of the Hocking District? Who supplies Eastern Indiana? Who supplies all of Western Ohio? Tell me, tell me you miners from the Hocking Valley who have seen your mines lay idle while West Virginia coal in train load lots has gone past your mines! Tell me you miners in Eastern Ohio who have stood idly by and watched Fairmont coal in train load lots taking your markets! Ninety per cent of that market is supplied by West Virginia coal from the non-union fields. I say to you the cost of living does not enter into this. I say to you these other elements did not enter into this. I say to you that the best price we can get for our coal under the competitive conditions will not admit of it.

"You miners who mine coal in the State of Ohio, and, if you please, in Western Pennsylvania, know that every bit of the trade I refer to was formerly supplied by Ohio and Pennsylvania even down to the gas business, but it is now supplied by West Virginia."

Mr. Maurer, Ohio.
p. 46, l. 16–40.

(28) "If it is a partnership, deal with it as a partnership."

Mr. Maurer, Ohio.
p. 46, l. 46, 47.

(29) "We both have a condition confronting us, and as long as West Virginia is in the field with her increased production and her low cost of mining you have got to put us on a competitive basis or you have got to lose your business."

Mr. Maurer, Ohio.
p. 47, l. 3–7.

(30) "I appeal to you in all fairness, I appeal to you as fair-minded men engaged in a common purpose, and that purpose is to find a market for your commodity, to bear a share of this burden."

Mr. Maurer, Ohio.
p. 47, l. 13–16.

(31) "Now the argument is made that we ought to turn our attention to West Virginia and stop the competition from that state. I admit that argument is good; but in order for that argument to have strength it is necessary for the operators at home to stop the kind of guerilla warfare they have among themselves."

Mr. Lewis.
p 48, l. 18–23.

(32) "Mr. Maurer has very well said—and I am glad he has brought the subject up—that we say to the operators, 'Get a better price for your coal in order that you can pay us a better price for our labor.' Then he supplements that statement, and very properly, by the statement that if they were to organize to get a better price for their coal they would be haled into court under the provisions of the Valentine law of Ohio and possibly sent to the penitentiary. Probably we would too. He supplements that statement by asking us to tell them how to get a better price for their coal. I am going to tell you. First, stop making war on the railroads. The poor fellows need help! And this proposition is going to be no joke. I recognize what the mining industry is; I recognize that it is more important than transportation. I recognize that the Valentine law of the State of Ohio was put on the statute books by a lot of political demagogues who believed they were working in the interests of the dear people—and they did it once for the dear people and about twenty times for themselves! I recognize that this industry does not occupy the plane among the industries of the country that it ought to occupy, because we have met in joint conventions year after year and discussed our wage relations instead of devoting some of our time to going out and telling certain people to keep their hands off our business.

"The railroad companies of this country say to the mine owners, 'We want our fuel at a certain rate.' The mine owners, in order to get a part of the fuel trade of the railroads, put down the prices in some instances to cost, not because of competition, but because of your desire to get a part of that trade. Then after securing a part of that trade the official representatives of the railroads are in so close touch with the leaders of the manufacturing industries of our country that the steam trade, as we call it, buys fuel almost at as cheap a price as the railroad company. Then in order to make ends meet somebody must pay a better price, and it is usually the domestic consumers, the masses of the people. And that is where the political demagogues get their work in, because they are the people who have votes and that is why they have anti-conspiracy laws placed on the statute books.

"That is not the only phase of it that hurts us. In order to crowd out somebody or in order to get a better price for coal going into the markets our friends on the other side, finding that the miners' contract is signed on this end, that the railroads are insisting on a lower price on the other side, seek to get a readjustment of the freight rates in order that they may increase their returns on their investment. What is the result? They haul the railroads before the railroad commission or before the Interstate Commerce Commission and secure a readjustment of freight rates as was done in Ohio recently when the rate was made 20 cents a ton lower than it was last year. Of course that makes a railroad feel good! The railroads, like the rest of us have more or less resistance in their makeup against what they call unreasonable demands. They go into the courts, and the operators will very probably say that while they have a decision from the Ohio Railroad Commission the chances are it will not become operative for a year or two because the railroads will fight it in the courts, the operators will do the same, and they will all spend money in legal fees that should go to paying our wages and go to giving you returns on your investment. It is true that that is what is transpiring, because you men deluded yourselves into the belief that the railroads are going to hold a dividing line along the Ohio River. Don't you think they will readjust the rates going over to West Virginia? Certainly. There is a well-founded suspicion in the minds of most men that the railroads have an indirect interest in the mines, not only in West Virginia, but in a great many other coal producing states. The railroads in Illinois have advanced freight rates 10 cents a ton on all of the coal to be handled there the coming year. The Illinois operators will probably meet us in conference, and they will say, 'We must get relief because the railroads have put on an increased rate of 10 cents, and you must meet the issue.' Of course we must meet the issue, no matter what we get. We are going to meet it. We are going to insist upon an advance in wages. We are going any length to enable you to get a better price for coal than you have been receiving; but we do not want so much competition in your own ranks. You should not come in here until you come, as they say in court, with clean hands on your own proposition."

Mr. Lewis.
p. 48, l. 38–51.
p. 49, l. 1–51.
p. 50, l. 1–11.

(33) "I am ready to admit with him that any system that sells to the big consumer, who can afford to pay a big price, a commodity at cost, or less than cost, and then in order to make up the deficiency taxes the little fellow who cannot afford to pay a price larger than it would be necessary under ordinary circumstances, is wrong."

Mr. Penna.
p. 50, l. 42–48.

(34) "The very purpose of the union is to increase the price of labor, to reduce the hours of labor, and then when that is done in this meeting we go home and there are attempts made, and often enforced, that further increase the cost. That is the very purpose of unionism. It has no right to life on any other plane than that, or least we have never discovered it. It has no object in existing that we know anything about except to increase wages and decrease hours of work, and it has been successful in doing it. It is also a fact that not more than one-half of the miners of the United States are unionized. Those who are not unionized work more hours, perform more labor for less money, and as a result throw on the market a cheap product. Those are the non-union men, those are the men who are our mutual foes. They are your foe, and as long as you pursue a policy of trying to get more from the operators in the territory that is unionized, getting more directly and getting more by indirect methods, you are furnishing an inducement to the non-union miner and to the non-union coal operator to remain in that position, because they are better able to take your trade, they are better able to take our markets, they are better able to get your work, and the operators are better able to get our profits."

Mr. Penna.
p. 51, l. 6–26.

(35) "It is time for you to step up with us and say to those men in West Virginia, 'You will either decrease your hours of labor and increase your wages to meet these conditions or we will meet them.'"

Mr. Zerbe.
p. 60, l. 20–23.

(36) "There are three things that are the cause of present conditions—too high cost of production, discriminating freight rates, and the low prices caused by competition with non-union fields."

Mr. Chapman, Ohio.
p. 61, l. 18–20.

(37) "It is an admitted fact that there is a difference today of between 40 and 50 cents per ton in the cost of production of coal in the union fields of Ohio and the non-union fields of the trade east and south of us in West Virginia, Kentucky, Tennessee and Alabama, and three of those states, gentlemen, are competitors in the markets of Ohio Coal—West Virginia, Kentucky and Tennessee."

Mr. Chapman, Ohio.
p. 61, l. 41–47.

(38) "The production of West Virginia for 1907 was 40,043,311 gross tons, 44,091,000 being net tons. In 1908 the production was 44,091,000 net tons. In 1909 the production was 44,495,000 net tons."

Mr. Chapman.
p. 62, l. 17–20.

(39) "Ohio's production for 1907 was 32,365,949 net tons; in 1908, 26,287,800 net tons, and in 1909, 27,756,172 net tons."

Mr. Chapman.
p. 62, l. 33, 34.

(40) "There are some more interesting statistics connected with this proposition. The following are the numbers of days the miners worked in West Virginia during the years from 1904 to 1909: 1904, 209; 1905, 213; 1906, 237; 1907, 234; 1908, 211; 1909, 192; making an average of 216 days of ten hours per day, or a total of 2,160 hours worked each year. Reduced to eight hours per day would be an average of 270 days each year. Ohio worked in 1904, 164 days; 1905, 171; 1906, 175; 1907, 204; 1908, 157; 1909, 165 days, an average for the six years of 173 days, or ninety-seven days less than the average work in West Virginia on the eight-hour basis."

Mr. Chapman.
p. 63, l. 1–3.

(41) "Now gentlemen, it is useless, after the discussions that have taken place here by the gentlemen who preceded me, to discuss at any great length the market that the non-union fields have taken from Ohio in the past. It has been well said that they are putting coal into Columbus, into Michigan, into Detroit, taking the markets that heretofore have been enjoyed by Ohio coal. In the city of Athens, Ohio, which is within three miles of several of the large producing Hocking Valley mines, West Virginia coal is being sold. The gentlemen who are familiar with the situation have informed me that over 2,000 tons of West Virginia coal was sold there between the first of September and a short time ago. Even in the town of Logan, one of the points where Hocking Valley gathers its trains to start its coal out to the markets they have, West Virginia coal is taking that market. The gentlemen who were in the Toledo convention and returned on the Hocking Valley train, if they had their eyes open, would have seen full solid trains of Norfolk and Western coal passing up over that road to Toledo. There was not a single car of Hocking Valley coal in the trains. At the town of Bowling Green, twenty miles south of Toledo; when I came through a few weeks ago, I saw every car of coal standing on the side tracks were loaded with West Virginia coal.

"Think of the proposition, gentlemen! Toledo, the central point at which several Ohio coal roads bring everything, and 60 per cent or more of the coal being consumed there is from West Virginia! The Pennsylvania people have a road coming in there, the Wheeling and Lake Erie have a road coming in there, the Toledo and Ohio Central goes in there, the Hocking Valley goes in there, and the D. T. & I. goes in there on a direct line. Now just consider that proposition for a minute, and is it any wonder that Ohio coal operators and interests are in the condition they are today with that state of affairs?

"It was well said by Mr. Lewis and Mr. Penna that people buy their fuel where they can buy it cheapest. I am not through with this proposition. I want to bring you to the city we are now holding this convention in and give you a few figures. In 1897 Pittsburg shipped by river, 1,401,000 tons of coal to the city of Cincinnati. The Kanawha region shipped by river 717,000 tons of coal. The Kanawha fields shipped by rail 704,000 tons. The other interests from West Virginia, Kentucky and Tennessee shipped here 275,400 tons. Now we will come to the year 1908.

"Pittsburg District shipped 535,000 tons to the city of Cincinnati in 1908 as against 10,401,000 in 1897. Kanawha shipped by river 867,000 tons in 1908, as against 717,000 tons in 1897, and Kanawha shipped by rail in 1908, 1,848,000 tons, as against 462,000 in 1897. The Pocahontas District, the Tennessee and Alabama fields shipped in 1908 by rail 1,512,000 tons to the city of Cincinnati as against 275,400 in 1907.

"Gentlemen, do you need any more statistics of this kind to show where the coal trade of Ohio and Pennsylsylvania is going? I do not want to worry you, but I have some more statistics that are interesting.

"Mr. Lewis: Go ahead.

"Mr. Chapman: I will now present the lake tonnage figures:

West Virginia—1901, 739,011 tons, 12.73 per cent;
1907, 3,249,505 tons, 19.02 per cent;
1908, 3,521,149 tons, 23.98 per cent;
1909, 3,793,517 tons, 25.61 per cent.

"Poor Hocking Valley, gentlemen, makes a bad showing.

"The following are the figures for Hocking Valley:

1901, 1,513,646 tons, 26.08 per cent;
1907, 2,125,692 tons, 12.64 per cent;
1908, 1,378,465 tons, 9.41 per cent;
1909, 1,199,670 tons, 8.10 per cent.

"The following are the figures for all Ohio:

1901, 1,824,507 tons, 21.37 per cent;
1907, 4,186,571 tons, 24.89 per cent.
1908, 3,484,845 tons, 23.81 per cent;
1909, 3,111,256 tons, 21.02 per cent.

"That shows what is becoming of Ohio's lake trade that we have heretofore enjoyed. These figures speak for themselves as to Ohio's condition."

p. 63, l. 20–51.
p. 64, l. 1–40.

(42) "Now I am going to say something that isn't very pleasant, but I will make the statement all the same. I have been told that some of the best lawyers in the country claim that your organization is liable under the same laws, if prosecuted, for combination in restraint of trade and that your check-off, although agreed to locally, is absolutely in violation of the law. These lawyers said they would be willing to take a case with their fees contingent upon their success in winning it."

Mr. Chapman.
p. 65, l. 3–10.

(43) "You made promises in 1898 that you have not kept. You may have tried to keep those promises, but you know what was said and what was done on the floor of the convention in 1898. I was a participant in it, as I have been in the preceding interstate movements. You know what the understanding was, and you know that at every session of every convention that has been held from that time down to the present we have asked you to carry out and make good what you said you would do at that first conference. In my opinion the only way you can ever hope to succeed in putting the union fields on a competitive basis in cost with the non-union fields, the only way you can give your people more work and the other fellows less is to reduce your wages to enable the operators to produce their coal at a cost that will enable them to take the trade. It can be done in no other way. You have tried the other process for twelve years and it has been a total failure; you are weaker now in the non-union fields than you ever were."

Mr. Chapman.
p. 66, l. 1–9.

(44) "It has been intimated by some of the gentlemen to me—and I took Mr. Lewis' remarks to indicate when he was speaking on the subject of railroad freight reductions to mean this—that should the operators of Ohio succeed in getting discriminating freight rates removed to some extent you would feel you were entitled to part of it."

Mr. Chapman.
p. 66, l. 17–22.

(45) "In 1907 and 1908 the miners earned more money in West Virginia at the prices they were paid there than were earned by Ohio. In fact they earned from one hundred to one hundred and fifty dollars more to the man. That tells the tale concerning that matter."

Mr. Chapman.
p. 66, l. 27–31.

(46) "'The controlling influence in Ohio has been the competition of West Virginia coals with the domestic product, unhampered by the restrictions that hamper states in which the miners are thoroughly organized, such as Ohio, and also because of the conditions of mining. The coals of West Virginia are said to be mined at about one-half the cost of producing Ohio coals and the West Virginia product has taken the Ohio markets to the full extent permitted by the difference in transportation expenses, leaving Ohio coals only such markets as may be near the mines, and as the means of transportation increases by which West Virginia coals are put farther into Ohio markets, the prospect of the Ohio mines is not bright.'"

Mr. Chapman.
p. 66, l. 40–51.

(47) "It is not surprising that West Virginia is on a mine-run basis. Why? Because a large per cent of all the fine coal that is produced in that State is made into coke. They even crush the lump coal after they produce it to make coke, which is much more valuable product to them and yields them more returns than the raw coal will. We haven't any of those coals in Ohio or Indiana and they have none of them in Western Pennsylvania outside of the coking coal as it is known there."

Mr. Chapman.
p. 68, l. 2–10.

(48) "The demands you make will mean the disruption of the joint movement."

Mr. Chapman.
p. 68, l. 17, 18.

(49) "West Virginia seems to be the stumbling block, the great obstacle in the way of bringing about an adjustment in the wage scale. Yesterday evening I met President Davis of the West Virginia miners' organization in the hotel lobby and asked him how many miners were here. He said there were quite a number of miners' representatives, and I told him I was going to make a proposition today to the operators, in view of the fact that West Virginia has been the subject of discussion here, that the operators and miners had both received a severe scoring, that President Davis and his miners be admitted. We have enough from the other side, from the Pittsburg District and Ohio who have interests in West Virginia to represent that State also for the operators. Let President Davis and his delegates who are here be admitted, become a part of the joint conference, make a scale for them, and then let the operators and miners jointly pledge themselves to go out after the agreement has been consummated and enforce its provisions on the operators who have not come here to be represented. I think in all fairness to both the operators and the mine workers that should be done. They should be given representation or they should not be the subjects of such severe criticism."

Mr. Feehan.
p. 78, l. 7–27.

(50) "I said yesterday that the mine workers of Western Pennsylvania, Ohio and Indiana who were represented here, were not going to permit either the miners or the operators of West Virginia to set a scale of wages for them or a standard of living. We are unwilling to accept their prices or conditions, although I have reason to believe there is not so much material difference as some of you would try to make it appear. I am unwilling, however, that they should be referred to, or that their conditions of labor or prices should govern the working conditions or the prices of the mine workers of the districts here represented.

"There is one point I want to bring out that has not been made clear, and that is the disadvantage the operators of Eastern Ohio are put to in competing for the markets against the operators who have interests in West Virginia, and that is the character of the veins. In West Virginia it is not an uncommon thing to have them develop from six to ten feet of clean coal. There is no slate to remove; it is easily mined; it is a good grade of coal; it can find a market; and when you take into consideration the cost of producing a ton of that coal compared with the little five-foot vein of coal in Eastern Ohio with its many impurities and its thick slate, and the Pittsburg District, with its weak roof, where in many cases it is difficult to operate a machine, as well as many other natural disadvantages the operators have, herein lies the cause of the competition more than in the cost of labor. The cost of labor is not the important factor that is crowding the Eastern Ohio operators out of the market on the lakes or elsewhere. It is the natural disadvantages that is doing it. There is one advantage the operators in Eastern Ohio have, and that is their geographical situation. They are nearer the lake markets and other markets, and I believe they have an advantage of from 15 to 25 cents a ton in freight rates. I understand that when the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission goes into effect they will have even greater advantages in freight rates. It is fortunate for them that they have these advantages. Were it not for their advantages in the matter of freight rates I am positive that many of the veins of coal now being worked in Ohio and elsewhere would be abandoned, and they would wait until the big veins with the greater natural advantages in West Virginia were worked out before they would again operate there. These factors have not been seriously enough considered heretofore."

Mr. Feehan.
p. 78, l. 28–51.
p. 79, l. 1–17.

(51) "A demand has been made for the run-of-mine system. I am not expressing the opinion of the Pittsburg operators now, I am speaking as an individual. If I had the power of the Czar of Russia and could enforce what I wished, I would have all the coal in the United States mined on the run-of-mine basis, provided the miners would be a little less human, provided they would be fair and give us the same grade of coal they are now giving us when on a screened coal basis. That would do away with the trouble. But our experience in years gone by and our experience now is quite the reverse of that. In 1898 we found where we were on run-of-mine our coal was simply shattered and shot to pieces. The increase in fine coal that is going through the screen after run-of-mine is a very large per cent. You know as well as I do that nobody will do work that he does not have to. We are all after short cuts, and after the easy way. The miner is not going to shoot his coal so carefully when he is paid for everything he brings down and loads out, as when he is on a screened coal basis and he knows he will be paid on what comes to him after screening. The kind of coal we want in the Pittsburg District, by reason of trade conditions, is clean, good, large lump coal, and that we must have to retain our trade.

Mr. Schleuderberg.
p. 84, l. 29–49.

(52) "If there are any men going from Western Pennsylvania to West Virginia is it not because they want to get where some of them at least feel they will be free men, where they will not be subject to the authority of the organization, and subject to the payments that some of them are required to make? Is not that perhaps just as good a reason as any that have been advanced?"

Mr. Schleuderberg.
p. 86, l. 1–3.

(53) "Every mining locality has certain local markets that are designated as particularly their own. I presume that is true of every district represented in this joint conference. Western Pennsylvania, Ohio and Indiana have markets that are designated as their own. That is proper and right. These markets are contiguous to the railroads traversing their property, and by reason of natural conditions, favorable location, freight rates and other things that are advantageous to them, these markets can be claimed as their own. I think any man must admit that so far as West Virginia is concerned her markets within her borders are very limited compared with the great production of coal in that district. It is an admitted fact that West Virginia must seek a market for practically the entire product outside the borders of that State. Ohio, by reason of her peculiar location perhaps suffers to a greater extent than the other districts. The great markets of the Northwest are sought by both the West Virginia producers of coal and by the producers of coal in Ohio. There is keen competition for those markets, and practically 90 per cent of the tonnage that seeks a market in the Northwest from West Virginia traverses the State of Ohio."

Mr. Green, Ohio.
p. 88, l. 25–44.

(54) "The railway systems of this country are the great consumers of coal, and it is a notorious fact that, notwithstanding they are better able to pay for the fuel they use than are the men who consume the coal that goes to what is ordinarily known as the domestic trade, these great railway corporations get their fuel cheaper than anybody else who buys coal. There is where a lot of trouble on this proposition is, and I repeat what has been said by my colleagues in support of my proposition, that one way by which you can pay us this advance in wages is to compel these great corporations that are getting their coal at ridiculously low prices to pay more for it. That will prevent you from longer giving away your product to those who are able to pay for it."

Mr. Green, Ohio.
p. 90, l. 27–39.

(55) "There is too much of a tendency existing in the minds of the men connected with the mining industry to see how much coal they can pick out of the hills and convert, as they believe, into value in the form of property or money, and in their anxiety to do it they go to work and take contracts at prices that they should not even consider. As a result some one has to suffer. When some of the operators suffer I do not blame them at all for their efforts to try to convince us we ought to bear the burdens and responsibility and share in the mistakes they have made. If they can convince us we ought to do that, I haven't a single word of complaint to make; but there will have to be more than mere statements made to convince me that that is the correct way of bargaining in selling and buying labor in these joint conventions."

Mr. Lewis.
p. 102, l. 15–28.

(56) "I agree with Mr. Green that the great State of West Virginia is reaching out in every direction. The gentleman that preceded him on the floor from the miners' side stated that, as far as Eastern Ohio was concerned, we had such a coal that we could not hope to market it, or something to that effect. If we cannot market our coal, what becomes of the 15,000 miners in our employ? That does not apply only to Eastern Ohio coal, but to every ton of coal that is produced in the State of Ohio. Our domestic coal is being supplanted by West Virginia coal. You know what district formerly supplied the great Northwest with its dock coal for domestic consumption—the Hocking district of the State of Ohio. Where is the great supply of domestic coal for the great Northwest coming from today? From the splint coal fields of West Virginia. It is not the cheap coal you refer to, but it is the domestic coal, it is every coal in the State of Ohio that has been supplanted by the product of non-union labor from West Virginia."

Mr. Maurer, Ohio.
p. 104, l. 6–22.

(57) "And I want to say to you that it is not the railroad corporations of the State of Ohio or any other State that pay the lowest price for coal. The lowest-priced coal that was sold in the State of Ohio was the coal that went on the docks to the great Northwest to hold the market in competition with West Virginia coals. When West Virginia named the price, $1.75 f. o. b. docks, Lake Erie ports, either Ohio had to meet it or go out of business in the Northwest. The operators of Ohio met the price and went into the markets and have protected them up to this time. If this is a partnership agreement that condition must be met, and for that reason I say the cost of living is but an incident. The cost of materials for the mines has increased, the cost of iron and lumber and locomotives and machinery has increased; but the price of coal has not increased and it has not increased because of the ruinous competition from West Virginia and Kentucky."

Mr. Maurer, Ohio.
p. 104, l. 30–45.

(58) "Now the question is this: Do the miners, 60,000 of them in the State of Ohio, who are in partnership with the mine owners of this State, expect to maintain their market or not? I want to say to you in all fairness that if the price of coal in Ohio is increased 10 cents or 5 cents per ton, two years from today the West Virginia competition in Ohio will not be 8,000,000 tons but 15,000,000. Now let's get down to the meat of the cocoanut, and what is it? Is it the cost of living? It is the best price we can get for the commodity we have to sell. It is your commodity and it is our commodity. It is your bread and butter and it is our bread and butter. It does not belong to West Virginia; it is ours. Are you going to stand with us and protect it?"

Mr. Maurer, Ohio.
p. 104, l. 46–51.
p. 105, l. 1–6.

(59) "Keep one thing in mind—keep the facts staring you in the face that for two years your mines have laid idle while West Virginia non-union tonnage took the markets that belonged to you and to us. We stand next to these markets. In order to maintain our markets we on this side invested our money in the great Northwest and built docks to keep the market for you. That market today is in jeopardy on account of the competition from West Virginia."

Mr. Maurer, Ohio.

(60) "I called attention the other day to the fact of what we believed the railroads of this country ought to do. What was that? That they ought to pay a higher price for fuel. That is not the first time I have talked about that. We have talked higher price fuel to the railroads in public more than all the operators in the United States put together. I don't know what they have talked behind the scenes. I made the statement also, as far as my memory serves me, that the Ohio operators had gone before the Ohio Railroad Commission and had secured a decision reducing freight rates 20 cents a ton from Eastern Ohio to lake points. I pointed out where, in my opinion, the transportation industry and the mining industry ought to be closer together than they are. I pointed out where, in my judgment, the operators should say to the railroad men, instead of having each other hauled into the courts, before railroad commissions and the Interstate Commerce Commission, fighting each other and paying large legal fees, they should get together and the mining industry ought to impress upon the minds of the railroad interests the necessity of paying a higher price for fuel. That is in substance what I said. And if the other interpretation was placed upon it, I am sorry for it, but it does not change my opinion in regard to the matter.

"Now let me tell you something else. In the face of the fact that Ohio has secured a reduction in the freight rates for lake points as against this non-union competition, in the face of the fact that they have secured a reduction of 20 cents a ton, I would not even take advantage of that and say you ought to give us half of that. I said you would probably have to fight that in the courts for a year. I pointed out all of those things in my discussion so there would be no element of unfairness in what I said. This is the first time in a joint conference, so far as I know, where the operators have undertaken to say I have resorted to unfair methods of discussion. I am sorry that has been said here. That is not my way of negotiating contracts. I tell our people when they are wrong just as quick as I do you."

Mr. Lewis.
p. 109, l. 38–44.
p. 110, l. 1–28.

(61) "So far as the railroad interests are concerned, and so far as I am concerned, if I had my way—and perhaps it is a good thing for the railroads I have not—they would not be able to buy a ton of coal anywhere in the United States for less than $1.25."

Mr. Lewis.
p. 111, l. 1, 2.

(62) "Mr. Savage, Ohio: I was surprised a minute ago to hear that some of the operators were not in sympathy with the men in trying to get a readjustment of their freight rates in Ohio. I know as one miner we did all we possibly could in giving testimony before the commission in Columbus, and from what I heard then I believed, and I believe now, that the operators were absolutely right in asking for this readjustment. I believe I can assure you that we will help you in every manner that we can to get that readjustment. But we would ask you, on the other hand, if we are willing to help you—and by helping you we agree we are helping ourselves—if you operators from Ohio and Pennsylvania will lend us the same assistance in West Virginia in getting the mining price up so that competition will not prevail. When we ask that what do we find? Operators have told me in years past that they were willing to have the miners organize in Ohio, but they were not willing that their miners should be organized in West Virginia. We find as great opposition on the part of the operators from this State who have mines in West Virginia as we find from the operators resident there. If we are going to work along the line of mutual benefit, let us make West Virginia a union State. Go down there and practice what you preach in Ohio. Help us get the protection of the law in that State and I think we can organize the miners. Instead of helping us, what have you done? You have done nothing but retard the progress of our organization in that State. The reason they have assigned to me for their attitude was that the calibre of the men employed in the mines of West Virginia was such that if they were organized it would be impossible to control them. I believe that a large percentage of those men are as intelligent as we are, and once they understand the benefits of the organization and the benefits of the contract we enter into, they will observe those contracts as religiously as the miners in Ohio, Pennsylvania, Indiana or any other State."

Mr. Savage, Ohio.
p. 112, l. 41–50.
p. 113, l. 1–23.

(63) "You men are in a position to get for the product of the mines a fair profit. You are the men who make the prices, and if you do not make the prices it is not the fault of the miners. If the miners had the power to make prices on your product, I assure you Eastern Ohio would not be selling 85-cent coal. As long as you continue to do as you are, you are the people who are responsible. If you want any assistance from the miners to raise the price of coal, we are at your command any time, but we are not going to raise it by taking a reduction in wages or working for the wages we are now getting. That is our position, and I believe you men understand it. As Mr. Lewis has stated to you, we know that selling coal at 85 cents a ton is not a very profitable business, and as long as you continue to do it you are going to be the losers. It is in your hands to remedy this condition and I hope you will do it or turn over the selling of your coal to the miners. If you do that the railroads of this country will not get 85-cent coal."

Mr. Savage, Ohio.

(64) "We believe in doing all we can to rectify the wrongs that now exist between the different coal competing states. We believe in the operators in Virginia bringing up the standard of the miners there. If the operators would put their shoulders to the wheel and do what they could to make it possible for us to go over there and talk to them we might be able to do something with them. You may say, 'Oh, you may say we can do that now.' Are you not all members of the great political parties which control the politics of West Virginia? How many of you have appealed through the press of the country against the outrageous assaults and murders of our men? I have never seen a protest coming from you men in regard to the conduct of the operators in West Virginia when they hire men to kill our people, and where the law makers and the law executors of that State sit by and say nothing of the assaults and murders. If you men did half as much as we have done toward organizing West Virginia and making conditions better, I believe there would be a change in the coal industry of this country. But we are not going to compete the way your proposition presents itself; we are not going to compete along those lines until first you have wiped out every vestige of organization there is in this country, and then we are not going to do it. If it were done, from the ashes of the organization you destroyed, would arise another organization more compact and powerful that would resist any such thing as that. The law of evolution is working along social and industrial lines, and we must place ourselves in position to accept the inevitable. The miners, like all the working men of this country, through the medium of machinery increasing the productiveness of the working people, have reached the point where we produce more than the world consumes."

Mr. McCullough.
p. 119, l. 1–27.

(65) "A very considerable amount of censure and criticism has been put upon some operators who are here because of the fact that they have gone to West Virginia and found investments. I will remind the other side of the house that the men who have gone into Virginia are business men; they are engaged in the coal industry, and they bring the commodity from one State to another to furnish fuel for such contracts as they take. They have found by experience that you as an organized body are not treating them fairly where they are circumscribed in the production of this commodity. They find that you are putting upon them burdens in the organized fields that do not exist in the unorganized fields. By reason of the fact that you cannot control in the production of this commodity, although we are willing to admit you have made an effort, their market is being taken from them or restricted or narrowed, and many of them in self-defense find it necessary, in order to carry out contracts and fulfill their obligations to those who take this commodity from them, to go to West Virginia and invest in properties there that they may continue a business for which they are obligated."

Mr. Zerbe, Ohio.
p. 122, l. 21–40.

"We might argue this up one side and down another for a year and we would be no nearer a solution of this proposition. We are, when we get through, right up against the one proposition we cannot get through which has been created by the competition brought to bear against us by the operators and the miners of West Virginia in the unorganized field."

Mr. Zerbe, Ohio.
p. 123, l. 46–51.

(67) "Chairman Kolsem: The question now is on the adoption of the motion to accept the proposition of the miners. If you are ready to vote the Secretary will call the roll.

"Secretary Brooks called the roll of States. The operators of Western Pennsylvania, Ohio and Indiana, voted in the negative; the miners of Western Pennsylvania, Ohio and Indiana, voted in the affirmative.

"Chairman Kolsem declared the motion lost for want of a unanimous affirmative vote.

"Mr. Lewis: I move that the entire proposition be referred to the Joint Scale Committee.

"The motion was seconded by Mr. Schluederberg and carried by unanimous viva voce vote."

p. 125, l. 18–30.

(68) "Mr. Lewis: In order to settle one matter I would like to know whether this is to be an open session. One or two newspaper representatives have asked me. I am not sure whether our Scale Committee meetings have been open or not.

"Mr. Zerbe: I move that the Scale Committee meet in executive session. (Seconded and carried.)"

p. 127, l. 6–11.

(69) Mr. Penna, Indiana: "I am going before this meeting is through, in very many instances, to accuse the miners of a lack of integrity, of absolute dishonesty, and having made the accusation I am going to prove it, and anybody that does not like it will have to dislike it; and if I am guilty, either through misunderstanding or wilfully so, I expect the miners to put it to me just as raw as I put it to them.

"Mr. Lewis: I expect we will."

p. 134, l. 42–49.

(70) "I don't believe in that. We must make up our minds that we are all friends and that we are working together against the common enemy."

Mr. Jones, Pennsylvania.

p. 135, l. 25–27.

(71) "Let us make up our minds that our interests are mutual and are not two sided. We have got to agree here upon a price at which we can market our goods as against the other fellow. Let us feel that we are one in negotiating this wage agreement."

Mr. Jones, Pennsylvania.

(72) "Mr. Chapman, Ohio: Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen: I have only a few words to say this morning on this mine-run proposition that has been discussed in all the conventions we have held for many years. The reasons why we oppose it have been given. I desire to state, as I did on the floor of the convention that when an investigation was held in the State of Illinois by the operators there they reported that by reason of going on the mine-run basis, their coal had deteriorated in value from 14 to 21 cents per ton. The purpose and object should be to get out of the coal that is produced the kind that will yield the most revenue in the selling of it to the purchaser. There are districts—as the gentleman who has preceded me knows, many of them in the State of Ohio, where it would be an impossibility upon any basis of mine-run to produce that coal for the markets it has to reach. And I say as one of the representatives of the Ohio operators that under no circumstances will they consider a proposition of mine-run coal for the product of Ohio."

p. 137, l. 16–32.

(73) "Prior to 1898 Indiana was based on the Hocking Valley price, and it was assumed, whether it was true or not, that we received the equivalent of the Hocking Valley screened coal price as a mine-run price. When we came into the Chicago convention a flat rate of 49 cents for mine-run coal was made for the Indiana district. The fact was brought out that the price made for mine-run was a better proposition to the operators than the Hocking Valley price, and it was so thoroughly believed by the operators of Indiana that they persistently insisted on remaining on a flat mine-run basis. I mean by this, regardless of whether they made screened coal or mine-run coal, they paid the miners of Indiana on a flat mine-run scale, when they could have had for their screened coal the Hocking Valley price.

"Now this condition remained in Indiana for a period of two years, over the protest of the miners, and was changed in 1900 in the city of Indianapolis by the adoption of a double standard, putting a clause in the contract that provided that where coal was shipped as mine-run it should be paid for on the mine-run basis, and where it was shipped screened coal it should be paid for on the screened coal basis. Since that time the miners of Indiana have been paid on a double standard. It is a fact in a majority of the mines in Indiana today that the miners do not know whether they are going to run screened coal one hour, two hours, all day, or half a day, or whether they are going to run mine-run. That is the situation in Indiana."

Mr. Lackey, Indiana.
p. 141, l. 14–39.

(74) "The fact is that the Indiana coal operators as an association have always stood, and are standing today, flat-footed in opposition to the mine-run system. The last time that the matter was discussed our association determined to avoid it carefully and get as far from it as we could. In Indianapolis, the time the gentleman refers to, we simply bought the settlement. Indiana had to pay the price, as she usually has had to do in those interstate meetings."

Mr. Penna, Indiana.
p. 142, l. 21–28.

(75) "Regardless of the argument presented against the mine-run system, if we were in a position to definitely state—and I admit I am not—the amount of coal that is sold mine-run and paid for on a screened-coal basis, I believe it would be astonishing to everybody here—astonishing from the large amount of coal that is sold run-of-mine and paid for on a screened-coal basis. In many places the coal is screened, weighed and run back together again. I have no knowledge of just how much coal is sold in that way."

Mr. Lewis.
p. 160, l. 9–17.

(76) "But I do desire, for the sake of correcting the records, to challenge the statement made by my friend on the other side of the house that the Indiana miners paid for the Chicago agreement. I deny, gentlemen, that the Indiana miners, or the Ohio miners, or the miners of Pennsylvania, or any other miners involved in the Chicago agreement paid for the settlement reached at that convention."

Mr. Ratchford, Ohio.
p. 166, l. 24–30.

(77) "Mr. Ratchford, Ohio: I have stated, Mr. Chairman, that I challenge the statement made this morning by a gentleman on the other side of the house that Indiana miners paid for the Chicago agreement. That is specific, I think. The statements made on the floor of the joint convention in connection with the Chicago agreement, and its relation to certain districts or parts of districts covered by this agreement, were made by Mr. Lewis. That I will discuss, and shall be glad to discuss with Mr. Lewis at any time, but I do not believe this is the proper place to discuss it. To be specific, Mr. Lewis stated, as I believe the records will show, that the Chicago convention was a matter of sale and barter and that the eight-hour work day secured at that time did not mean a material reduction in the hours of labor to certain miners in Ohio. That is what I referred to."

p. 166, l. 41–47.

(78) "There were premiums paid by the operators and miners in Chicago to get an agreement. I do not care what other name you give it, that is the proper name. In Chicago the miners of Illinois got an advance of 3 cents in the mining rate on the mine-run basis, while in the other districts on screened coal they got 10 cents a ton, so far as Indiana and Ohio were concerned. In the Pittsburg District they wiped out an inch and a half screen—and what else? They accepted an inch and a quarter screen, accepted the rate and wiped out the 9-cent differential that existed between the Pittsburg thin-vein and Ohio. I do not care what you call it—there were premiums paid for certain things. In Indiana, where there was a fixed differential made for Illinois in the Danville field of 10 cents, Indiana was placed in a position, wedged in between the two districts, where they accepted a 12½-cent differential. In Indiana the miners had been forced on the mine run system, and with the prices fixed on account of the relation of Indiana to Illinois, and Ohio to Pennsylvania, it would have been a reduction to our men in that state. On the other hand, Indiana operators, had they accepted the other end of the proposition and placed all their mines on a machine mine-run system, would not have secured the same advantage the Danville District of Illinois did under the Chicago agreement.

Mr. Lewis.
p. 167, l. 24–46.

(79) "Mr. Lackey stated that Indiana paid for the settlement in Chicago. I want to deny that in as positive language as I can and say to Mr. Lackey and to other gentlemen here from Indiana that no condition was imposed upon that State, intentionally or unintentionally, that was calculated to be a detriment to it. No condition was imposed upon the Pittsburg people, although they were called upon to yield 9 cents of their wages. The miners of Ohio might say with equal force that they paid for the Chicago agreement for several months of a strike. If what Mr. Lewis says of the Massillon miners is correct, they might say they paid for it by sacrificing a half holiday. The Hocking operators refused to become a party to the Chicago agreement until some time just prior to the first of April. Upon that general principle the miners of all the districts covered by the Chicago agreement were called upon to make some sacrifice somewhere to effect that agreement. The truth of the matter is—and you must all know it—that prior to the Chicago convention conditions in the mining districts lacked uniformity to a very great extent, and in order to effect an agreement, it goes without saying, that they all had to give up something in order to be brought together. Indiana did its share. Ohio did its share, and Pennsylvania did its share. If the miners of any of those districts refused to do for the general good that which they were asked to do, there could have been no Chicago agreement."

Mr. Ratchford, Ohio.
p. 168, l. 38–50.
p. 169, l. 1–11.

(80) "In order to fix basing prices in the different districts and establish a general scale that was uniform in its application, with the purpose in view of bringing together all of the mine workers of the different States and all the day labor in the mines we had to make concessions here and there and everywhere in order to bring about that uniformity. In the Chicago convention, although it is made the subject of criticism more or less, more was accomplished for the mine workers of these states than has been accomplished by any convention since or before. The admission was made on the floor of the convention two years ago that the only advance you received since 1903 was 12½ per cent. The Chicago convention, saying nothing of any other considerations, secured a greater increase for you, besides equalizing the size of the screens—which were different sizes, lengths and breadths—made a uniform day wage scale and established an eight hour work day. It did more, it established the greatest co-operative association perhaps of employers and employes in the world, an association that has worked successfully for a greater number of years than any other similar organization, and has been of mutual advantage to both sides. The Chicago convention secured an advance of nearly 18 cents. I hope in your criticism of it and of the proceedings of that meeting, both here and elsewhere, you will at least be fair and represent the facts as you know them."

Mr. Ratchford, Ohio.
p. 170, l. 1–23.

(81) "When I said that the outcome of the Chicago conference was a bargain and sale I told the truth. What else was it?"

Mr. Lewis.
p. 170, l. 38, 39.

(82) "I believe the Chicago convention was a great affair, I believe it was one of the greatest economic affairs that ever transpired in this country up to this time;"

Mr. Lackey, Indiana.
p. 172, l. 15–17.

(83) "The chairman stated that the question before the house was a motion to adopt Section 1 of the miners' proposition.

"Secretary Brooks called the roll of states, both operators and miners. The representatives of the miners all voted in the affirmative, the representatives of the operators all voted in the negative and the motion was declared lost.

"Secretary Brooks read the second section of the miners' proposition as follows:

" 'An advance of ten cents per ton for pick mining and an equivalent advance for machine mining and a corresponding increase for all day work, dead work, yardage, etc.'

Mr. Feehan, Pennsylvania: "I move the adoption of the section as read.

"The motion was seconded by Mr. Greene, of Ohio.

"Secretary Brooks called the roll of States, both operators and miners. The representatives of the miners all voted in the affirmative, the representatives of the operators all voted in the negative, and the motion was declared lost."

p. 173, l. 7–24.

(84) "I think the fundamental basis on which this movement is established is to bring about as near as possible equal competitive opportunities and relations between the different districts. I cannot understand by what process of reasoning you can say in one district, or part of a district, that a certain price shall be paid for a certain class of work, and in another district, or in another portion of the same district, that a different or lower price shall be paid. I believe our movement has for its purpose that the labor cost of a ton of coal shall be about equal in the different districts."

Mr. Green, Ohio.
p. 175, l. 34–44.

(85) "I maintain that if a trimmer trims one hundred tons of coal in Eastern Ohio at a certain rate of wages, another man trimming the same amount of coal in the Pittsburg district should be paid the same rate of wages. It is a fair proposition. And the same is true in the different sub-districts within the district. I believe that from a competitive standpoint we ought to be paid, because it enables you to each be on the same footing, with competitive equality, and competitive opportunities. The labor cost for the production of a ton of coal, when a uniform rate of wage if paid, is the same to all and no man should expect any more than a square deal and an equal opportunity with another man."

Mr. Green.
p. 176, l. 27–39.

(86) "Mr. Lewis: I would like to ask a question. You desire to dispense with the labor of those so-called inefficient men, whether drivers or any other class of labor. Does that carry with it that such an individual can get employment in the mine if he desires?

"Mr. Penna: Sometimes, and sometimes not.

"Mr. Lewis: That is the point I wanted to bring out. As an organization we have not insisted on the retention of men who were inefficient and incompetent. We have asked and I might say we have insisted, that under our contract provisions, when a man is taken away from his employment because of his incompetency or inefficiency, he ought to in all fairness have a job mining coal, or loading coal, or whatever employment of that kind the operator has for him."

p. 180, l. 45, 46.

(87) "Mr. Penna: There could not very well be any exception taken to the statement of Mr. Lewis that their association has not insisted on the retention of men because of incompetency and inefficiency in the class of work they are performing. And I do not know but that can be said truthfully of every branch of the mine workers' association, but the local officers assume to decide upon the competency and the efficiency and the management is denied the right to decide that question. And invariably when there is an attempt made to move or to change men because of their incompetency or inefficiency, or because of common, ordinary laziness, we are accused of being prompted by ulterior motives, and it means a fight in the mines, a long drawn-out squabble, investigations, meetings of committees, argument—in fact, it is easier and cheaper for a coal operator oftentimes to keep a good for nothing cuss in his employ than it is for him to tread the devious course he is required to do to get rid of him. That is the situation, and yet the fact remains that we do not insist on retaining incompetent men. I have said to our people, and have insisted as far as I have been able to, that if a man came to build a fence for me and I had to pay for it I would decide absolutely and without interference as to his competency or as to whether I wanted to continue him to do that work. If I hired him to drive my wagon I would be the same, and if I was running a coal mine I would do the same or I would not run. The man who pays the price is the man who should be satisfied with the character of the work performed, and he alone should be permitted to decide whether or not that man is satisfactory to him in the performance of that work. If not, he should be permitted to remove him, and remove him promptly. If the coal operators were permitted to do that they would with profit, not only agree on your demands for a uniform day wage price, but they could afford to pay you more wages. That is not the case; they are not allowed to. That work is delegated to a committee and the committees are not usually, or not always at least, the most intelligent men in the mine."

p. 181, l. 12–46.

(88) Chairman Whetzel: "Are you ready to vote on the motion before the house? The motion pending is that the third section of the miners' proposition be divided. If there are no objections, we will vote on the motion to divide the proposition.

"Secretary Brooks called the roll of States. All the operators voted in the affirmative, all of the miners voted in the affirmative, and the motion to divide the third section of the miners' proposition was declared carried.

"Chairman Whetzel: The vote will now be on the first part of the proposition, 'That we demand a uniform rate of wages for all classes of inside and outside day labor.' The Secretary will call the roll.

"Secretary Brooks called the roll of states. All the miners' representatives voted in the affirmative, all the operators' representatives voted in the negative.

"Chairman Whetzel: Lacking a unanimous vote, the proposition is lost.

"Mr. Lewis moved the adoption of the second portion of the section, 'That time and a half be paid for over-time, Sundays and legal holidays.' (Seconded.)

"Secretary Brooks called the roll of States. All the miners voted in the affirmative, all the operators voted in the negative.

"Chairman Whetzel: Lacking a unanimous vote, the motion is lost."

p. 185, l. 12–35.

(89) "There being no further discussion on the proposition, the roll of States was called by Secretary Brooks. All the miners voted in the affirmative, all the operators voted in the negative, and the motion to adopt the fourth section of the miners' proposition was declared lost for want of a unanimous vote."

Mr. Lewis.
p. 186, l. 32–36.

(90) "I think the time is coming in the development of the coal industry of this country when we will be able to agree upon a minimum basis for mining and make it a perpetual contract. That is the kind of plan I have in mind. I do not know how soon it will come. There is only one thing in the way, and that is the lack of such an organization among the operators and the miners as we ought to have to govern the industry. I think if our friends on the other side could have a national organization and we could have a complete national organization on our side the time will come when we will establish the relative mining prices in the different districts, and we can afford to fix a minimum basis as a wage scale and make it a perpetual contract. We could go from that up, but not below it. If anybody tried to get below it we would attempt to find out who was trying to injure the trade."

Mr. Lewis.
p. 187, l. 5–19.

(91) "Secretary Brooks called the roll of States. All of the operators voted in the affirmative, all of the miners voted in the affirmative, and the motion to defer action on the fifth and sixth sections of the miners' proposition was declared carried.

p. 188, l. 22–25.

(92) "Back in about 1870 and up to about 1880 the most prominent coal field in Ohio was that known as the Mahoning Valley. The coal was mined on the run-of-mine basis. It was in the No. 1 seam. About that time the Mining Department was organized. There were a great many accidents for the amount of coal produced in the State. That field began to diminish in output and the Hocking field began to increase in output. As the Hocking field began to increase and the Mahoning Valley to go down the Tuscarawas came up and accidents began to decrease. The Mining Department took credit for better supervision and for the reduced number of accidents. In my judgment it was a matter of natural conditions. In the early days of the Hocking Valley and up to within a few years I never saw a safer seam of coal for men to work in. In the largest mine in the Mahoning Field there were men killed frequently, in fact there were more men killed than in the entire Hocking Field for years. When the Hocking Field was at its best the Eastern Ohio Fields were not very largely developed. There were a few mines around the Wheeling District, I believe, and there were a great many accidents. They had a bad roof. As the Eastern Ohio Field increased in production accidents began to increase. After the anthracite strike a great many coal mines were opened in Ohio."

Mr. Thomas, Pennsylvania.
p. 190, l. 14–36.

(93) "If we had secured legislation that would impose hardships on the operators during a contract, it would have been different. We obtained no new legislation, however, and the operators introduced these things without our consent."

Mr. Feehan.
p. 194, l. 8–12.

(94) "The operators were in no way responsible for the changing of the explosives. They were commanded to do it by the mining department of the State of Pennsylvania."

Mr. Dempster, Pennsylvania.
p. 194, l. 19–22.

(95) "The seventh section of the miners' proposition was voted on. All the miners voted in the affirmative, all the operators voted in the negative, and the motion was declared lost.

"Secretary Brooks read Section 8 of the miners' proposition as follows:

"'There shall be no limit to the amount of deductions for the organization.'

"Mr. Bitner, Pennsylvania: I move the adoption of the section.

"The motion was seconded by Mr. Rollins, of Indiana.

"There being no discussion on the motion, Secretary Brooks called the roll of States. All the operators voted in the negative, all the miners voted in the affirmative.

"Chairman Whetzel: The proposition not receiving a unanimous vote, under the rules is declared lost.

"Secretary Brooks read the ninth section of the miners' proposition as follows:

"'That no district under the control of the United Mine Workers be permitted to enter into an agreement to reimburse the operators for any money expended for labor, directly or indirectly, wherein the law says the expense shall be borne by the operators.'

"Mr. Donovan, Pennsylvania: I move the adoption of the section.

"The motion was seconded by Mr. Laverick, Pennsylvania.

"There being no discussion on the motion, Secretary Brooks called the roll of States. All the operators voted in the negative, all the miners in the affirmative, and the motion was declared lost."

p. 196, l. 47–49.
p. 197, l. 1–25.

(96) "Mr. Lewis: In order to get this before the committee, I move that we refer the entire subject matter we have had under discussion to a sub-committee of two miners and two operators from each of the districts represented in this conference.

"The motion was seconded by Mr. Zerbe."

p. 198, l. 13–17.

(97) "Mr. Green, Ohio: I believe this motion should be amended to provide that the commissioners from each district and the International officers from our side should be made members and participate in the work of the subcommittee. While there may be two members from each district in the sub-committee from the miners' side, I am sure we want also the International officers.

"Mr. Chapman: They have always been in the committee.

"Mr. Green: If we ask to have them in I think it is no more than right that you should have on your side such commissioners as you may designate.

"Mr. Zerbe: Change that to commissioners of parties interested.

"Mr. Chapman: If that is understood there is no necessity of an amendment.

"Mr. Green: If there are no objections the motion is not necessary.

"Chairman Whetzel: In the Joint Convention you adopted the rules that governed the Toledo meeting. In this committee you adopted the rules that governed the Joint Committee in Toledo. When we say International officials, let it be understood as it was in Toledo to include the President, Vice-President and Secretary-Treasurer.

"The motion offered by Mr. Lewis was adopted."

p. 199, l. 17–40.

(98) "The miners announced the appointment of the following members of the sub-committee: Ohio, G. W. Savage, William Green; Pennsylvania, Francis Feehan, S. A. Whetzel; Indiana bituminous, W. P. Rollins, G. W. Lackey; Indiana block coal, George Morgenthaler, J. D. Holden."

p. 200, l. 6–10.

(99) "Mr. Sullivan, Ohio: Before you put the motion, I desire to make a statement. Yesterday afternoon in discussing the question of the men who are found to be incompetent to take charge of the different parts of the work in the mines, I stated, and so did Mr. Lewis, that we had no objection to the removal of men if they are not competent, or if their habits are such that in handling dangerous machinery they would endanger their lives or the lives of others. We would certainly not object to the removal of such men. If a driver or a day man is found not doing his duty or neglecting his duty we will not object to his removal. We followed that up with a statement that you had a right to remove such men, but we hold the right to investigate as to whether or not the removal was correct. I want to remove a wrong impression the Indiana operators may have in regard to this matter. You give us an investigation at all times in regard to those men.

"Chairman Whetzel: We will take notice of that later on.

"Mr. Sullivan: I want to have the record clear on that question.

"Mr. Lewis: Whatever I said stands on the records. I am not going to ask the operators whether or not we are to have a right to investigate. If we make a contract that contract will determine the matter."

p. 200, l. 14–36.

(100) REPORT OF SUB-SCALE COMMITTEE.

"Secretary Brooks, for the committee, reported as follows:

"To the Scale Committee of Western Pennsylvania, Ohio and Indiana, Miners and Operators:

"Gentlemen: Your sub-scale committee, appointed by you Saturday, March 12, 1910, met at the Assembly Room of the Hotel Sinton on Monday, March 14, at 2 o'clock p. m., and organized by electing

Mr. S. A. McCullough, Chairman.

Mr. F. S. Brooks, Secretary.

Mr. Edwin Perry, Assistant Secretary.

"After this and further sessions through the mornings and afternoons of Tuesday and Wednesday, March 15 and 16, they now report that they have been unable to agree.

S. A. McCullough, Chairman.

F. S. Brooks, Secretary.

Edwin Perry, Assistant Secretary."

p. 201, l. 9–25.

(101) "Mr. Lewis: It is quite evident the sub-committee was not able to agree on anything. I think we have about reached the period in our deliberations now where we will probably have to report to the Interstate Joint Convention, unless it is the desire of the parties to take up for discussion the questions we have had before us. I realize that we have discussed practically every phase of the situation and have reached that point, according to the report of the sub-committee, where our business is practically at an end. I realize the seriousness of the situation. I realize what it means to the mining industry of this country. I appreciate the fact that if we go away from here without an agreement it means industrial war, with all the attendant hardships that naturally follow in the wake of such a condition. I think for that reason, even at this time, we can afford to make haste slowly. Unless we are going to take up again the discussion of the matter before we decide to adjourn and report to the Interstate Convention we desire to report to our own convention. The operators may wish to do the same. However, I am not speaking for the operators, but for our own people. There is nothing left for us to do but report the action of this Joint Committee to the Joint Convention. That is the body that created this committee, but before we report to them the miners would like to report to their own convention. We will then be able to join you in reporting to the Interstate Joint Convention."

p. 201, l. 31–43.
p. 202, l. 1–11.

(102) "Mr. Zerbe: I want it understood that this is not an Interstate Joint Convention; it is a Tri-State Conference. The Interstate Joint Convention is a thing of the past. We have not recognized it during the present meeting.

"Mr. Lewis: I do not want to split hairs, but in discussing this matter I want to use any language I wish to express my ideas. This is an Inter-State meeting. If you want to call it a Tri-State meeting it is all right; I have no objections, but I fail to see where there is any difference in the position taken by Mr. Zerbe and myself, but out of deference to his wishes we will call it the Tri-State Convention after this."

p. 202, l. 28–38.

(103) "One thing is certain, and that is that we would like to have an agreement; that we would like to avoid a suspension of operations in the mining industry. We are going to do everything in our power to avert such a contingency; but if we are unable to reach conclusions the natural outcome will be that you gentlemen will endeavor to fix the responsibility upon us and our people will endeavor to fix the responsibility upon you."

Mr. Lewis.
p. 204, l. 18–25.

(104) "I do know as a general proposition that men will buy where they can buy the cheapest, counting quality and quantity; and when it comes to coal it does not matter where it is mined, it does not matter by whom it is mined, the consumers of coal in this country are after cheap coal and they will buy it where they can get it for the least possible price. They always have done that and they always will.

"I do not wish to refer to anything that was said in the sub-committee; but you gentlemen know that the difference between the cost of production in the union fields and the non-union fields is not what is paid to labor alone. After you have paid the laboring man in the union field more for mining coal and the day man more for doing their work, there is an additional cost in the union fields that they do not have in the non-union fields. There is a cost of production, and, whether you account for it or not, it is there and it must be charged up to the fact of the existence of the union and the union's meddlesomeness and unwarranted interference with the operation of the property. That is not a small item. I say to you people here now that the United Mine Workers, as we meet you here face to face as men doing business, are not the United Mine Workers we meet at home around the mines. You are two separate and distinct organizations. Here we meet you as men who profess to be fair and who try to be fair; but when we go home and undertake to operate the mines with union labor we meet with the criminally inclined, with the men who have no respect for law nor order nor the rights of others, who have no respect for anything but their own desires, with or without reason. And we meet with district officers who are depending upon that kind of votes to perpetuate and continue them in office, and they are ready to wink at the dishonorable conduct of the men, if not openly and squarely endorse it. In some instances they do that. Ten cents a ton advance for mining in a non-union field would not mean the same as it would in the union fields. Ten cents a ton advance in a union field in excess of a non-union field, with an additional cost for other labor around the mines, only represents a part of the increased cost of production of coal in a union field as against a non-union field. I don't know how many of you know these things, but I know that some of you know them."

Mr. Penna, Indiana.
p. 207, l. 21–51.
p. 208, l. 1–8.

(105) "I don't know whether this institution is going to live or die. I have loved it and have worked for it. I have worked for it as faithfully and arduously as anybody could; but if in this institution we have reached a point where we are invited to go up against ultimatums, where we are met with propositions dubbed conservative—and you gentlemen the judges absolutely as to whether or not they are conservative—if we are to be told that things are reasonable, and you are to be the absolute judges of the correctness of that statement, then this institution ought to die. If it has reached that state it has ceased to be useful and thereby forfeited its right to life."

Mr. Penna, Indiana.

(106) "The very inception of this movement was a competitive basis, competitive abilities, competitive relationships—these are the very fundamental principles on which this thing was organized many years ago and on which it was continued. All we say now is, 'Put us in a position where we can market our coal in competition with our mutual enemies and with each other and we ask no more.' Your position is, 'Competition or no competition, we want an advance, and we want it because we are big enough to take it.'

"Now I am not going to express any regret or sorrow at the breaking up of this institution. If it has to break up on this proposition, the breaking up ought to be a year of jubilee, because we cannot be any worse off and we may possibly be better. At least we will get to squirming around and try to get something else as a substitute. We cannot find anything worse, and anything we find will have to be as good, if not a little bit better. If the movement has outlived its usefulness it ought to die. It will die, and the only sorrow I shall feel in connection with it will be the sorrow I would naturally feel at the passing of an old, old friend who could not, in the ordinary course of things, expect anything else and who, in the course of the law of nature, must die. This will pass the same way if it has to pass."

p. 210, l. 5–26.

(107) "Secretary Perry: I want to answer a few of the statements made. I am not ready to say that this joint movement has outlived its usefulness. For a number of years I have maintained the belief that it was founded as a result of linking together modern thought and advanced ideas to add stability to the mining industry. I believe it has, and I believe it will continue, if these latent forces exercise their function, to be a power for good in the future."

p. 211, l. 21–28.

(108) "The price paid for mining in West Virginia is not the only cost of production. Those men have bills to pay that you do not, and you know it. It is not necessary that I should mention what they are. As a result of the organization trying to organize that field there is an added cost to the production of those operators. In my judgment, as far as the unorganized fields are concerned, if the miners are paid an advance in the organized fields I do not believe it will be possible for the mines in West Virginia to operate and pay the present rate of wages."

Secretary Perry.
p. 211, l. 38–46.

(109) "The miner is not consulted about what coal is going to be sold for, and if we undertook to say to our friends on the other side what they should sell their coal for, if we were not told it in plain language, the intimation would be strongly conveyed to us that it was none of our business—and very properly so. On the other hand, we are unwilling for any operators to attempt to invade markets, when it comes to a standpoint of competition, and reduce the selling price of coal in order that that market may be enlarged, and then come back to us and tell us we must foot the bill. We are not going to do it.

"It is recognized that we have some right to help fix the standard of payment for our labor, and when the gentlemen on the other side agree with us on that standard, or fail to agree and we fix the standard ourselves, in order not to go out of business it becomes necessary for them to be a little more careful in regulating the selling price of coal."

Mr. Lewis.
p. 215, l. 12–28.

(110) "The extra cost in producing a ton of coal outside of contract provisions referred to in this meeting is recognized by myself as one of the representatives of the United Mine Workers. If a mine stops one single day when there is work to be done, contracts to be filled and cars on the sidings to be loaded, if everything is prepared to go ahead with the day's work, there is an unnecessary added cost in producing coal under such conditions."

Mr. Lewis.
p. 216, l. 3–9.

(111) "You have too much politics in the organization in the United Mine Workers of America. You are not here in good faith; you are not here asking it because you need the advance in pay; you are asking it because some one committed himself by saying the miners would get it. We stand here in good faith and say that we have raised your pay from the time we started negotiating with you to the present, and now we have got to that level of the value of your labor where we cannot go any further and compete with those who do not pay the same."

Mr. Zerbe, Ohio.
p. 221, l. 28–36.

(112) "I recognize that there is competition from West Virginia; I recognize also that there has been keener competition between the operators making contracts with us than between them and the operators of West Virginia."

Mr. Lewis.
p. 224, l. 25–28.

(113) Mr. Feehan: "I know the miners I represent, and if they are going to starve, they will not starve in the mines. If they take my advice, they will get the advance they are asking for in these demands or the mines will be idle. It will be unprofitable for us to work, and we will find out whether or not it is unprofitable for the operators to operate under the figures we state.

"Mr. Dempster: I do not understand fully what you said about the profits and the stoppage of the mines.

"Mr. Feehan: I said if the miners take my advice they will get the advance they are asking for or the mines will be idle. It will be unprofitable for us to work, and we will find out whether or not it is unprofitable for the operators to operate at the figures we stated."

p. 226, l. 10–23.

(114) "You are going to give us an advance and you are going to give us better conditions because you can afford to do so. You are going to get greater prices for your coal, and there is not going to be a suspension. If you do not sign an agreement here, you will realize before the first of April that it will be cheaper to pay the advance."

Mr. Feehan.
p. 227, l. 48.
p. 228, l. 1–5.

(115) "Mr. Dempster, Pennsylvania: Do you mean that you will take the position of laying down an ultimatum for us that we must sign a scale for run-of-mine, an advance in the price, and pledge ourselves to carry out certain conditions that may be included in that scale?

"Mr. Feehan: Those are the demands of the miners of our district.

"Mr. Dempster: Is that your ultimatum?

"Mr. Feehan: So far as I am concerned the ultimatum is the demands of the miners.

"Mr. Dempster: That is the ultimatum—either swallow that or choke?

"Mr. Feehan: So far as I am concerned."

p. 228, l. 14–26.

(116) "Mr. Zerbe: I did not state that any information was derived from any of the United Mine Workers when I spoke of politics in your organization. I am pleased to say I never heard a United Mine Worker express himself in that way yet; they have been always loyal to the organization. An advance was given you at one time in Indianapolis because one gentleman, I have good reason to believe, hoped to be made a United States Senator."

p. 230, l. 3–9.

(117) "Mr. Chapman: I have very few statements to make now; but I want to correct one statement made by Brother Lewis when he said there had been no serious complaint from any part of Ohio concerning competition with West Virginia except from Eastern Ohio. If you will read the records you will find the statement I made was that the business of the Hocking Valley and other districts of Ohio was being absorbed and taken from every part of the territory in which Ohio coal had been sold, and I cited by name many sections of the country ranging from the Ohio River to the lakes where the business was being taken by West Virginia coal. That is the statement I made on the floor of the Joint Convention, in the Scale Committee and everywhere else."

p. 230, l. 20–31.

(118) "Secretary Brooks read section 8 of the miners' proposition, as follows:

"'There shall be no limit to the amount of deductions for the organization.'

"Mr. Bitner, Pennsylvania: I move the adoption of the section. (Seconded by Mr. Halapy.)

"Mr. Feehan: I believe this is a question that has not been given very much consideration. There have been practically no arguments on their demand for an unlimited deduction for the organization, and I want to say for the miners of the Pittsburg District that we believe we should regulate the amount of deductions, either for the organization or for other purposes, charitable or otherwise. This matter should be left exclusively with us. In view of the fact that it is a part of the agreements in other States that are represented here, we believe it should become part of the Interstate Agreement. I hope to see this part of the miners' demands agreed to.

"Secretary Brooks called the roll of States on the motion to adopt Section 8. All the miners voted in the affirma tive, all the operators voted in the negative, and the motion was declared lost for want of a unanimous vote."

p. 235, l. 6–26.

(119) "During our deliberations on the question of conceding to the mine workers an advance in wages the operators' strongest argument was their inability to pay an advance because of the alleged competition from certain sections of West Virginia. Our answer to that argument has been that it was not competition from West Virginia that caused the low selling price of coal in the districts represented in this meeting. Our arguments and our statements have been that because of the competition among the gentlemen who are in this convention the selling price of coal is as low as they claim. We have challenged the operators to refute that statement, and up to this time they have not been able to successfully do so. We claim, Mr. Chairman, that we are on the eve—no, we are right in the midst—of the beginning of one of the most prosperous industrial periods this country has experienced in the last twenty-five or thirty years. We claim that the operators will share in this era of prosperity; we claim that every manufacturer in this country of ours will do likewise; we claim—and there is every evidence to support our proposition—that the railroad companies controlling the transportation systems, the men who purchase the largest part of the commodity we produce, will share likewise in this prosperity that now is here and that will grow brighter and better for the next few years. We claim that because of these conditions we, as mine workers, must share in these improved conditions, and we are unwilling to renew a wage contract that will not carry with it an advance in our wages. Our friends on the other side of this proposition have been compelled to acknowledge the abnormal increase in the cost of living. There is no disputing the fact that our men, as far as their earning power is concerned, coupled with the purchasing power of the results of their labor, are not as well off today as they were ten years ago, or at any time between that period and the present.

"We have weighed well the consequence of failure to reach an agreement in this convention. We know what a suspension of work means to us, and we know what it means to the mining industry of this country. We know what inconvenience may result to all other branches of industry; we fully realize that we must discommode the American people. We have weighed all phases of the question carefully, and, having done so, we have made up our minds that any contract fixing the wages and governing our employment must carry with it an advance. (Applause.)"

Mr. Lewis.
p. 240, l. 29–49.
p. 241, l. 1–21.

(120) "We are entitled to the first consideration in these matters, and other people, outside of the mine workers, and the mine owners, are entitled to second consideration. I know that in making that declaration it may be hurled across the country that the mine workers are selfish men; that they are not mindful for the interest of other people. We have to consider that phase of the situation and count the cost in the event we are compelled to resort to a suspension of work in order that we can secure an advance in wages and meet our honest obligations."

Mr. Lewis.
p. 242, l. 1, 2.

(121) "Mr. Lewis says that the present condition of the industry is due to unwise competition. The Government of the United States and the Government of the State of Ohio says that we must compete. There are probing investigations all over the United States today trying to find out whether or not there are combinations in restraint of trade, whether there are combinations being formed for the purpose of getting high prices. Do you think that in the face of that the operators sitting on this side of the house can in any manner or in any form get together and say, 'Our price is so and so'? I am free to admit that if it were not for this condition, and if the law of the land permitted it, if there were no restrictions, no complications, we might get together and fix the price of coal."

Mr. Maurer, Ohio.
p. 243, l. 5–17.

(122) "Every miner in the Hocking Valley knows that a few years ago your products went on the Great Lakes to supply the domestic markets of the great Northwest. The docks were filled with it. The homes and the business places of the Northwest were supplied with it. Who supplies them now? The splint coals of West Virginia. These coals are mined so cheap that Hocking coal cannot touch them. Is that competition? Tell me, Mr. Lewis, are the operators on this side of the house doing nothing to meet these conditions? They have invested millions in the Northwest in docks so that our coal can be placed there, so that we can take care of that market. People sitting on this side of the house, through their industrial efforts, have induced the great railroads of the Northwest to handle their coal and buy it for steam purposes. I went to the mines with one of the purchasing agents of one of those roads, Mr. McDonald. I went there with him to demonstrate the value of our coal, and we supplied a million and a half tons of that coal to the Northwest for that trade. For the past two years, however, in order to keep those docks and protect our interests we sold that coal at 80 cents a ton to meet the competition of West Virginia. Is that competition? Every dock owner on this side of the house, were not his mining properties of more value than the docks, would have put Virginia coal in there because it was cheaper; they would not have put a pound of Ohio coal there. They have done their share to protect the industry.

"Have we no markets left that can be protected? Go to the city of Columbus, right in the heart of the Hocking District, and how much Hocking coal do you find there? Go into Marion, go into the little town of Lima, Ohio, and you will find a 100,000 tons of West Virginia coal supplying a contract there. Go into Toledo and what do you find? There was one contract of 60,000 that I went after myself, and if I could have made a price of 75 cents to meet the competition I could have had the business. And your President dares to tell me there is no competition from West Virginia! I know what I am talking about. I know what we sold coal for, and I know that every ton of coal we sold to meet those market conditions was sold at an absolute loss."

Mr. Maurer, Ohio.
p. 244, l. 10–46.

(123) "Am I fair? Gentlemen, there may be States in the Southwest, there may be other States and districts that are able to pay an advance; but do not crush this State between the upper and the nether millstone of high wages on the one side and non-union competition on the other."

Mr. Maurer, Ohio.
p. 245, l. 16–20.

(124) "I do say, however, that there is no law in this country to compel you to sell your coal or to give it away. There is no law in the United States that will compel us to labor if we don't want to."

Mr. Lewis.
p. 246, l. 35–38.

(125) "I do not propose to attempt to defend the non-union fields of West Virginia. I know, as do the other miners on this side, that the non-union product of West Virginia is a serious proposition. As evidence that we recognize that fact, out of the meager earnings of the men on this side we have contributed month after month and year after year to try to organize that field and bring them up to a competitive basis with our friends on this side."

Mr. Green, Ohio.
p. 251, l. 39–45.

(126) "Unfortunately we do not regulate the selling end of it. We have nothing to do except with the producing end of it."

Mr. Feehan, Pennsylvania.
p. 256, l. 32, 33.

(127) "I am not talking to the great American public, and I don't want to. I know what the American public will do for you and for this side of the house. The American public will get its fuel where it can get it cheapest, and the fact that your children are crying for bread will not influence the purchase of a single ton of coal if the American public can purchase the same amount of coal for five cents less. The American public will buy coal from the gentlemen on this side just as long as they can sell it a little cheaper than someone else, and they will pat them on the back while they do it; but when the other fellow comes along and offers the same coal for a fraction of a cent less, regardless of the location of the market, regardless of wages or anything else, they will buy it from him. I admit no responsibility to anybody anywhere except from that side of the house to this, and from this side to that."

Mr. Penna, Indiana.
p. 259, l. 18–32.

(128) "The production of coal in itself is not a peculiar thing to those who know how to produce it. Marketing coal is not in itself a mysterious proposition. To secure a fair price when selling coal is not a difficult thing when those who have charge of fixing the selling price will endeavor to get together for that purpose."

Mr. Lewis.
p. 260, l. 12–16.

(129) "I pause, however, long enough to inquire, 'What is the use?' It is true that in every joint convention I have ever attended—and I believe that I have attended all of them that have been held—the miners formulated their demands, then came in and presented them; the operators formulated other and opposite demands sometimes and presented them; but in the miners' demands were no ultimatums and in the operators' demands were no ultimatums. Throughout the entire negotiations there was a position on both sides of flexibility—for want of a better term. If I could find a better term I would use it. Even my friend Lewis in attempting to refute my statement has said, and he has done persistently, that the contract must carry with it an advance in wages. Heretofore I have never seen the miners come into a joint convention in such a position and assume such an attitude."

Mr. Penna.
p. 262, l. 6–21.

(130) "What is the matter that we haven't the opportunity to work? Men who are producing the same commodity you are, cause your lack of opportunity to work."

Mr. Chapman.
p. 267, l. 44–46.

(131) "Isn't it time, gentlemen, that the industry in Ohio and in other States that are unionized should be protected? With more than half the entire product of the country produced by non-union men, if we are to protect and perpetuate our industry in Indiana, Ohio and Western Pennsylvania, we should call a halt. Do you want to destroy the industry in Ohio that in the past has been equal in value to all the wheat produced within the State? If you continue your demands you will bring that result to the industry."

Mr. Chapman.
p. 268, l. 11–19.

(132) "Mr. Chapman, Ohio: I ask by what authority any gentleman has the right to offer upon the part of Ohio a proposition for an advance of 5 cents a ton, except he be an Ohio man?

"Mr. Lewis: We have made contracts in the past for Ohio, even when the Ohio operators were not present. We have made agreements after the block coal operators of Indiana had taken part in the deliberations and withdrawn. We have agreed on the terms of a contract, and it was up to the miners then to see that it was carried into effect. Is there any motion before the house?"

p. 272, l. 3–12.

(133) "Mr. Lewis: In moving the adoption of the report of the committee I recognize that it brings this conference face to face with a crisis in the mining industry of our country. I recognize that the adoption of this motion may carry with it a suspension of work in the mines of this country from one end to the other. The adoption of this motion, unless there is some method found to negotiate the provisions of a contract that may be reasonably satisfactory to the miners and operators, will carry with it the withdrawal of every proposition that has been under consideration, so far as the mine workers are concerned. It may mean the formulation by the convention of the United Mine Workers of a policy that will mean industrial war, with all the attendant hardships that are incident to such a condition in our mining affairs. I recognize that there are some men in the mining industry on the mine owners' side who may temporarily benefit by reason of a suspension of work. I know that there are men in the mining industry, as there are in Wall Street, New York, who are gambling in a commodity that is so important in the life of the industries of this country. I have every reason to believe there are some mine owners who have stocked a certain amount of coal contingent on being able to earn a large profit as a result of a suspension of operations. I recognize also the possibility of some of those men doing everything they can in their power, directly and indirectly, to force a suspension of the operation of the mines. I recognize in addition to that—and I want to state the position of the miners plainly and positively—that it has been the hope, the desire, the ambition and the work of some operators to prevent a settlement, with the expectation that the mine workers of this country would tie themselves up with a policy that everyone would have to sign a contract before anyone would be permitted to sign.

"I have said before, and I repeat now, that those operators can eliminate from their minds any such delusions as that, if they now possess them. I want also to emphasize the fact that in the event of these three States adjourning this Joint Tri-State Conference without an agreement, it will not prevent the miners' representatives from inviting the representatives of the operators of a less number of states or a less number of districts than are here represented to come into a joint meeting for the purpose of endeavoring to negotiate the terms of a wage contract. And if we, as miners, and the operators of some districts are able to negotiate the terms of an agreement that will be reasonably satisfactory to the miners and the operators who may become parties to such an agreement. I want to emphasize another fact, and that is that the operators who may retire from this meeting and take no part at this time in negotiating a wage contract cannot expect to have the assurance that they will be able to negotiate a contract on the same basis as operators who may sign the agreement in this city before we leave. In other words, operators who retire from the movement do it of their own accord, accepting with it all the responsibilities, and must if they engage in a struggle, be governed by the conditions of that contest. If they are successful in an inevitable contest that will take place, I am willing to admit that they will fix the terms of any settlement that may be agreed upon between them and their employes. But if the mine workers are successful in that contest, then I want to say now, in order that our position may be clearly understood, that we will dictate the terms upon which any settlement is made with us. We want this understood at this time, in order that the people of this country will know our position as mine workers."

p. 285, l. 6–49.
p. 286, l. 1–17.

(134) "It must be borne in mind also that the mining industry of the country is depending upon the outcome of he negotiations in this city. It must be understood—and it is known to the operators, whether they will admit it or not—that the operators of the outlying districts who are not represented in this conference will pay such an advance in wages as may be agreed upon by the operators and the miners of this Joint Convention. The operators who will cause the adjournment of this joint meeting are assuming more than the responsibility of causing a disagreement in this instance. They are assuming the responsibility of a possible suspension of mining operations from one end of the country to the other, and they will not be permitted to shirk that responsibility so far as we are concerned."

Mr. Lewis.
p. 286, l. 29–42.

(135) "The unfortunate situation is this—and that is why an inter-state or a tri-state agreement sometimes works a hardship upon both parties—but the situation is that upon the wage scale adopted here the whole bituminous fields of the country base their wage scale; and whether the miners of this particular field or this particular State are entitled to an increase or not, if they fail to get the increase then that result follows all over the country."

Mr. Maurer.
p. 296, l. 39–46.

(136) "Turn the Ohio operators and miners loose from this convention, say that you will not handicap them."

Mr. Maurer.
p. 298, l. 15, 16.

(137) "There are but four more working days left, and as one I do not want to go up to the ragged edge of the expiration of our contract, because if we are going to do that by preliminary, or a continuance of negotiations, then as a representative of the miners we will be required to formulate a circular notifying our entire membership that if they do not get word to the contrary before the end of the month there will be a suspension of work."

Mr. Lewis.
p. 300, l. 11–18.

(138) "If this partnership continues there must eventually be a time when we must either adopt some fair method or we must part company."

Mr. Maurer.
p. 304, l. 2–5.

(139) "Mr. Lewis: I do not know whether I have made our position clear. I have tried to. We have reached the point now where we are going to waste no more time. I do not want to be understood as saying we have wasted any up to this time, but our people think we have. I recognize that we have been unable to reach an agreement up to this time. It seems to be absolutely hopeless for us to reach an agreement here, from the statement made by one of the gentlemen on the other side to me a moment ago. I want to make it clear now that if we can adjourn this joint conference of the three districts we still have left an opportunity to see whether or not we can negotiate a contract that will be reasonably satisfactory to all parties concerned. And when this convention adjourns—and it is going to adjourn quite soon—we are going to ask all the operators of Indiana and Western Pennsylvania to remain. We will also ask all the operators of Ohio to remain who will do so with the distinct understanding that any agreement that will be finally negotiated will carry with it an advance in wages. We may just as well talk out in the open. I have been trying to do it all the time. I would rather that the operators and the miners of the three States would agree. If there is the least hope that by the representatives of the three States going into a scale committee, or even if there is the least hope of their agreeing here, I would favor such a procedure. There is a limit to how long we can stay here, because there are only four days left in this month, and if our men suspend work on the first day of April—and that is what they will do if there is no agreement—then the time would be passed for talking about negotiating, especially with the mines in operation, for they will then be idle. I have always been opposed to negotiating contracts or settling disputes while the mines are idle. Our friends from Ohio say, 'Let us go out of the conference.' While I am going to say it as kindly as possible—and I dislike very much to say it at all—there is nothing to prevent the operators who are unwilling to negotiate a contract with an advance in wages from retiring from the meeting. However, it is preferable to move an adjournment of this Tri-State Convention in order to see whether anybody else wants to make an effort to negotiate a contract.

"We are not going to precipitate a suspension of work or a strike without exhausting all reasonable efforts at our command. We are unwilling to go into a scale committee meeting for the purpose of prolonging discussion, and I might say that we will not do it. This thing must be settled one way or the other, and that very soon. The limitation of time itself will settle the question. Much as I would like to spend to-morrow as other people will spend it, we are going to occupy our time tonight and tomorrow in outlining our plan completely to meet any emergency that may develop in the mining industry of this country on and after April 1. We are going to be ready to negotiate a wage contract, or, if compelled to, we are going to be ready to the best we can to defend our rights as wage earners to sell our labor at the best possible price in order to get sufficient to meet our obligations and take care of our families as American families ought to be taken care of."

p. 310, l. 8–48.
p. 311, l. 1–12.

(140) "I concede to you gentlemen, the same rights that I claim for myself. I have no right to say to you, 'You shall work at less wages than you want to,' you have a right to quit any time you desire, and we have a right to say that we will not operate our properties if we do not want to. We have a right to say further that if we find men who have heretofore been in our employ who are willing to work in our properties at the wages we can afford to pay, if they say they can make a good living at those wages and that their earnings are sufficient to support themselves and their families under the laws of this country we have a right to employ them and they have a right to work for us.

"I hope that your President, representing your body of men, not only here but in various other fields of this country that he says are depending upon whatever adjustment may be made here to fix their scale of wages, will present for our consideration a clean-cut proposition covering all the points at issue between us."

Mr. Chapman, Ohio.
p. 312, l. 48–51.
p. 313, l. 1–13.

(141) "We have been at this work now since January. We are tired, just as tired as you gentlemen are, and the only expression we have been able to get from you gentlemen is, 'agree to an advance in wages, and we are going home without strings to us to increase that advance twofold if we can.' We know what it means! We are not going to agree to an advance in the mining rate and then take the chance of going back to our respective States and have it duplicated, or have to go into the same industrial war we would have to go into if we failed to agree here. We would just as soon fight, if fight we must, as the result of a disagreement here as to fight for a disagreement in our own respective districts. It is war all the same, and there is not any more hell in it if it is inaugurated in the districts than if it is inaugurated here."

Mr. Penna.
p. 317, l. 17–31.

(142) "This movement cannot continue if we pursue the kind of policy I think I have observed here, that of seeking to take advantage, that desire to gamble by making the rules and playing the game."

Mr. Penna.
p. 318, l. 38–40.

(143) "I fail to see where there is any necessity of prolonging the sessions after what has been said by the operators this morning. When I say a thing myself I mean what I say and am willing to support that position to the limit. I want to say now that whatever policy is outlined by the miners in separate convention, that policy will be carried into effect so far as I am concerned until victory is perched upon the banner of the United Mine Workers, or until we are completely routed from one end of this country to the other. I want to say that under like circumstances, if it shall fall to the lot of the miners to be defeated, then I shall recognize the right—because I shall be compelled to—of the operators to name the terms under which we will be permitted to labor. On the other hand, if we are successful everything within the power of human agency will be done to make this impending conflict a success.

"Then as the victors we will say to those on the other side that we will dictate the terms upon which we will be employed, or upon which our labor will be sold to those who operate and manage the mines of this country."

Mr. Lewis.
p. 356, l. 44–49.
p. 357, l. 1–13.

(144) "CHECK OFF.

"17. Operators will make collection for the miners dues of 50 cents per month, with an addition to this of one-half of 1 per cent of the gross earnings, which shall be collected when the miners so request. Special assessments for the National Body to be deducted as requested by the miners. Initiation fees to be taken off, but not to exceed one dollar per man in any one pay. This to apply to employes inside the mine only.

"Notice of such collection to be given at the mine on the first and sixteenth day of each month for the succeeding pay.

"Collections for the Union shall follow checkweighman, accident and death benefits, rent and smithing."

'1. That an equal price for mining screened lump coal shall hereafter form a base scale in all the districts above named, excepting the State of Illinois, the block coal district of Indiana to pay 10 cents per ton over that of Hocking Valley, Western Pennsylvania and Indiana bituminous district; and that the price of pick run-of-mine coal in Hocking Valley and Western Pennsylvania shall be determined by the actual percentage of screenings passing through such screens as is hereinafter provided, it being understood and agreed that screened or run-of-mine coal may be mined and paid for on the above basis at the option of the operators, according to market requirements, and the operators of Indiana bituminous shall also have like option of mining and paying for run-of-mine or screen coal.

'2. That the screen hereby adopted for the State of Ohio, Western Pennsylvania and the bituminous district of Indiana shall be uniform in size, six feet wide by twelve feet long, built of flat or akron-shaped bar of not less than five-eighths of an inch surface, with one and one-fourth inches between bars, free from obstructions, and that such screen shall rest upon a sufficient number of bearings to hold the bars in proper position.

'3. That the block coal district of Indiana may continue the use of the diamond screen of present size and pattern with the privilege of run-of-mine coal, the mining price of which shall be determined by the actual screenings; and that the State of Illinois shall be absolutely upon a run-of-mine system, and shall be paid for on that basis.

'4. That an advance of 10 cents per ton of 2,000 pounds for pick-mined screened coal shall take effect in Western Pennsylvania, Hocking Valley and Indiana bituminous districts on April 1, 1898, and that Grape Creek, Ill., and the bituminous district of Indiana shall pay 40 cents per ton run-of-mine coal from and after same date, based upon 66 cents per ton screened coal in Ohio, Western Pennsylvania and the Indiana bituminous district, same to continue in force until the expiration of this contract.

'5. That on and after April 1, 1898, the eight-hour work day with eight hours' pay, consisting of six days per week, shall be in effect in all of the districts represented, and that uniform wages for day labor shall be paid the different classes of labor in the fields named, and that internal differences in any of the states or districts, both as to prices or conditions, shall be referred to the states or districts affected for adjustment.

'6. That the same relative prices and conditions between machine and pick mining that have existed in the different states shall be continued during the life of this contract.

'7. That present prices for pick and machine mining and all classes of day labor shall be maintained in the competitive states and districts until April 1, 1898.

'8. That the United Mine Workers' organization, a party to this contract, do hereby further agree to afford all possible protection to the trade and to the other parties hereto against any unfair competition resulting from a failure to maintain scale rates.

'That this contract shall remain in full force and effect from April 1, 1898 to April 1, 1899, and that our next annual inter-state convention shall convene in the city of Pittsburg on the third Tuesday in January, 1899. Adopted.

(232) "COLUMBUS DAY WAGE SCALE.

INSIDE DAY WAGE SCALE FOR AN EIGHT-HOUR DAY.

Columbus, Ohio, March 10, 1898.

"The following resolution was adopted at a meeting of the scale committee of the Interstate Convention at Chicago January 22, 1898:

Resolved, That two operators and two miners from each state meet at Columbus, Ohio, on the second Tuesday in March (or March 8), 1898, at the Chittenden Hotel to formulate a uniform day work scale based upon the district upon which the mining prices are based.

In accordance therewith, the representatives of the various competitive districts met at the Chittenden Hotel, Columbus, Ohio, March 8, and agreed upon the following scale of wages and conditions to govern all inside day labor for the year begining April 1, next, and ending April 1, 1899.

INSIDE DAY WAGE SCALE.

Tracklayers	$1.90
Tracklayers' Helpers	1.75
Trappers	.75
Bottom Cagers	1.75
Drivers	1.75
Trip Riders	1.75
Water Haulers	1.75
Timbermen, where such are employed	1.90
Pipemen, for compressed air plants	1.85
Company men in Long Wall Mines of Third Vein District, Northern Illinois	1.75
All Other Inside Day Labor	1.75

The above scale was arrived at by taking the average of the wages paid in all of the competitive districts and reducing said average to an eight-hour day, then adding the advance to said average to correspond with the advance in price of mining to be paid April 1 next.

RESOLUTION I.

The above schedule of day wages applies only to men employed in the performance of their labor, and does not apply to boys unless they can do and are employed to do a man's work.

RESOLUTION II.

Whereas, We have failed to agree upon a uniform rate of wages for the different classes of outside labor for the entire competitive field, owing to the variations of conditions over which we have no control;

Resolved, That the employing of outside day laborers around the mine, and wages to be paid the same, shall be left entirely to the employers and such employes in all the competitive districts, and the question of uniform wages for outside labor be referred to our next Interstate Joint Convention.

Resolved, That where any members of the present force of outside day labor in the competitive field prefer to work in the mine in preference to accepting the wages offered for their services as outside day laborers, they shall be given places in the mine to mine coal.

RESOLUTION III.

Resolved, That an eight-hour day means eight hours' work in the mine at usual working places for all classes of inside day labor. This shall be exclusive of the time required in reaching such working places in the morning and departing from same at night.

Regarding drivers, they shall take their mules to and from the stables, and the time required in so doing shall not include any part of the day's labor, their work beginning when they reach the change at which they receive empty cars, but in no case shall the driver's time be docked while he is waiting for such cars at the point named.

RESOLUTION IV.

Resolved, That when the men go into the mine in the morning they shall be entitled to two hours' pay whether or not the mine works the full two hours. But after the first two hours the men shall be paid for every hour thereafter by the hour, for each hour's work or fractional part thereof. If for any reason the regular routine work cannot be furnished the inside labor for a portion of the first two hours, the operators may furnish other than regular labor for the unexpired time.

The above was agreed to after the most careful discussion of each item, and we believe it to be the best and most equitable solution of the questons involved, taking into consideration the various interests to be harmonized in order to reach a uniform scale.

It is expected that all the prices and conditions shall be strictly adhered to by both operators and miners.

This book is otherwise known in the record of the case of the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company against John Mitchell and others as McKinley's Exhibit No. 3. [Record pp. 706, 291.]

(233) "Francis Feehan. There is no one more pleased than I that the interstate joint convention has been re-established, and that we are assembled to at least make an effort to negotiate a wage scale. This has been brought about after months of effort on the part of the mine workers' organization."

p. 21, l. 41-45.

(234) "H. L. Chapman, of Ohio: Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen—In making this motion on behalf of the operators for this length of time for this contract, I do not know that I can emphasize our reasons for making it more than I have done in the past. But the operators of the three states feel that they would not be justified in the present conditions that prevail in the coal trade throughout this competitive field, and with the outlook for the present year of the business, they do not feel that they could be justified in making an agreement for one year, but they are hopeful that the conditions of the country will change from what they now are and have been for the last four or five months, during the year following this year. Presidential election coming on this year, and whatever may take place as a result of that, it matters not whether one side is successful or not, we hope that such a condition will prevail in the business affairs of the country that it will be settled, and that there will be a revival of the conditions of business that the operators of the competitive field would have a fairly remunerative business for the last year of the contract if it was made until the date that I have named. I do not believe that there is an operator today in this competitive field that is producing coal that believes that there is a show for the year 1908 and a part of 1909, the time that this contract, if only made for one year, would run, and they cannot hope to more than break even in their business for this year on the present prices. And you gentlemen know just as well as the operators know that in the non-union fields that in the place of paying the present wages, or the wages that have been paid in this field in the past two years, reductions have taken place already, and more reductions will probably take place. And the operators of this competitive field who are acting with you want to continue and act with you people, and you cannot expect but what they have got to meet this competition that comes from that source during the year, because with the restricted trade that is necessarily going to exist the efforts that are being made by those in the non-competitive fields are marvelous to secure the trade that the organized sections have heretofore had, and they are being successful already in many instances.

"Now in brief, gentlemen, these are the reasons why the operators of the competitive field of Western Pennsylvania and Ohio and Indiana feel that they cannot do otherwise than make that contract to extend for the period that I have named. In all justice to you people and to ourselves we believe from our standpoint that it is to the interest of both of us that it should be maintained. You are now receiving the highest price that has ever been paid for any considerable time in the bituminous coal field, and

p. 52, l. 10–47.
p. 53, l. 1–11.

(235) John H. Jones, of Pennsylvania: "You want to point your guns at your enemies. You want to point your guns at the operators who in the past have not proved by their actions that they are friends of yours or of organized labor. This is the thing you should do in the next two years. Do not point them at your friends; turn them on the men who are not your friends.

"At the present time there is coal being mined in non-union districts, and it is encroaching upon our markets; even in places where they have differences between them they are dropping them and taking away the contracts from the union fields. The question has been asked, why haven't we had this state of affairs during the past two years? The reason is, we have had very prosperous times, and there was plenty of trade for all. This is not the case at the present time; and if the operators mining in non-union fields in this district can maintain their present position, i. e., have their coal mined at ten cents to twenty cents per ton less than operators employing union labor, and are enabled to market their coal at the prices at which they are marketing it, it is going to place both operators and miners in a very embarrassing position in the very near future.

"In the Pittsburg district, which is the greatest industrial center in the world, the largest number of operators who are mining coal with non-union miners have already forced a reduction of from ten to twelve per cent. Now you should make a settlement for two years and turn your guns where they belong."

p. 58, l. 18–43.

(236) Francis Feehan, of Pennsylvania: "Now I have very little to say in reply to Mr. Jones of the Pittsburg district. I am very desirous of lending all of my efforts to prevent, if possible, the production of non-union coal. I know that it has been my policy as an officer of the organization to try if possible and agree along with the operators who have entered into a contract with us and are dealing as business men should do, and if I had any fighting to do I would want to fight the fellow that was unfair and who was taking advantage. We feel that this should be done. However, it is well for me to remind some of the Pittsburg operators at this time that our guns were kept very warm in the Pittsburg district trying to force some of them to live up to their contract, which they had entered into without devoting any of our time and attention to the non-union business."

p. 59, l. 45–50.
p. 60, l. 1–8.

(237) "President Lewis: All of the membership of the organization of miners of this country gave these instructions. If it were only a question of the three states we could settle it right here in this convention, but not being a question of the three states it will go to the entire membership with these recommendations."

p. 63, l. 15–20.

(238) "H. L. Chapman, of Ohio: Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen: Speaking for myself and the Ohio interests, this question of stopping the mines upon a little local difficulty and causing them to become idle, whether it is the fault of the miners, or the fault of the operators, or rather the mine bosses, or some one else, there ought to be some way in the interest of both sides that could prevent this. I agree with Mr. Lewis in his statement that at times there are men at fault who have charge of the mines, as well as the miners sometimes. I have no case of that kind myself; but the company I represent in the Hocking Valley, that the time we were not at work on June 23, 1906, to December 3, 1907, taking all of the stoppages at our mines, and counting them as if they were at one mine, and counting the hours and the days and everything of that kind over these trivial differences that in my judgment no man or mine ought to have stopped at all, the difficulty ought to have been adjusted in a businesslike, sensible way between the operators and the representatives of the miners, according to the statement that I have, all of mines put together which would be for one hundred and seventy-six days.

"G. W. Savage, of Ohio: Enumerate the causes.

"H. L. Chapman, of Ohio: There were scores of causes; and I could not give them without having the paper on which I have it. They were questions of local character pertaining to the mines; but I know that it foots up to one hundred and seventy-six days. It seems that the fault in some of the cases was with the company, and in other cases the fault was with the miners; but it don't make any difference whose fault it was, the fact remains that the miners were stopped. In these mines taking them all together, I figured at them a little while today, and I found that these mines stopped over two hundred men, and maybe more than that, and they were probably getting about $2.55 per day, as the average earning power of the men during that time, and this would amount to $80,000.00 that the miners of the Sunday Creek Company lost during that period over what they would have had if they would have continued at work.

"Mr. Sullivan: Did you lose any contracts, Mr. Chapman?

"H. L. Chapman, of Ohio: I am not talking about that. On the other hand, the mines lost, for it undoubtedly lost to the company whatever profit they might have made on the coal that they would have produced during that period of time if it had been put into the market; this in addition to all of the men who were employed to take care of the property, and the monthly salaries of other men. Putting the profit on the coal that would have been dug from the mines in that period at fifteen cents a ton lump coal, then it undoubtedly cost the company thirty thousand dollars during that period."

p. 68, l. 25–47.
p. 69, l. 1–25.

(239) P. H. Penna, of Indiana: "And then I want to add that there are unorganized fields in this country today that could be named that have cost you people hundreds of thousands of dollars, and lots of work, and pretty near cost the hide of some of my friends; there are cases in that shape."

p. 73, l. 44–48.

(240) "President Lewis: Before this report is voted on I have a resolution which ought to be read, and I will read it with your permission.

"Whereas, We, the representatives, of the operators and miners of Western Pennsylvania, Ohio and Indiana, believe that the Illinois operators and miners should be a part of the Central Competitive Field Joint Movement:

"Resolved, That we, the operators and miners in this joint convention, extend to the operators and miners of Illinois an urgent and cordial invitation to join with us in the next interstate joint movement in the next joint convention in February, 1910.

"I move its adoption.

"Chairman Zerbe: It has been moved that we adopt the resolution just read by President Lewis.

"P. H. Penna: The Illinois operators and miners are in joint convention in Springfield at this time, attempting to make a scale, and I think it would be a graceful thing to do if Mr. Lewis would endorse it; that in addition to the resolution he has prepared that our President and Secretary be instructed to forward that resolution to their meeting in Springfield, together with the congratulations of this joint convention and the expressed hope that they may be able to reach an amicable settlement.

"President Lewis: If Mr. Penna will make that as an amendment to my motion, I will accept it.

"P. H. Penna, of Indiana: I offer it as an amendment to be added to the motion of Mr. Lewis.

"Mr. Kelly, of Illinois: I believe we have a right to be heard in this matter yet. We from Illinois are not here today asking for anything except that which we believe we are entitled to, and I want to say to you that we have a few things that we are entitled to at this time. The President of the National organization has expressed the absolute views of the Illinois miners, and we have no desire to contradict any report that he has made. I do want to say for the Illinois miners one thing, and I would be doing myself an injustice if I failed to do this. This man has come here and made this same speech in every convention that we have had for the past ten years, and—

"Chairman Zerbe: The gentleman is out of order.

"Mr. Kelly of Illinois. I believe we have as much right to the floor as Mr. Chapman, and with all due respects to his views we have a right to come here nevertheless, and we are asking you now if you are going to leave us here to fight our battles through in making local agreements? I have this to say to you gentlemen, and that is all I have to say—I appeal to you now because of the fact that there are more of you than there are from Illinois. I do appeal to you now and ask you to hold up your hands in this attempt to re-establish and bring about what Tom Lewis calls the Interstate Joint Movement. If it is not possible for him to bring the Illinois operators and miners into this joint conference, when in God's name can you bring them in?

"I want to go further and call attention to the statement made not over sixteen days ago, when he said that the Ohio operators had something like three million tons of coal they wanted to sell, and then they would make an agreement with us and not until then. I said the other day on the floor of this convention that there was a collusion between the operators of the three states, and I want to repeat it now, notwithstanding my friend Penna wants to deny it."

p. 107, l. 15–45.
p. 108, l. 1–30.

(241) "Chairman Zerbe: Now the question before the house is on the motion of Mr. Lewis, amended by Mr. Penna, in regard to the message to be sent to Illinois. That is not debatable. All in favor of this resolution will signify it by saying 'Aye.'

(The motion was voted on and carried.)"

p. 110, l. 20–24.

(242) "President Lewis: Several delegates have asked me, and I want to explain the discussion on this question of the referendum vote. It will not be just the districts represented here, but will be a vote of the entire membership."

Readopted to govern Joint Interstate Convention of 1908.
McKinley's Exhibit No. 3.
p. 16, l. 36–39.

(245) "Mr. John Mitchell: I move to amend the report of the Committee on Credentials by inserting the following: That the miners and operators of the states of Kansas, Missouri, Arkansas, Texas and Indian Territory be admitted to the joint conference and granted the same privileges accorded to operators and miners from the States composing the Central Competitive Coal Field. (Seconded.)

"Mr. Robbins: Until the report of Committee on Credentials is adopted there can be no convention. The call for the convention was for the representatives of the operators and miners from the four states of Illinois, Indiana, Ohio and Pennsylvania. The report brought in establishes this convention members of those four states on the part of the operators and miners. I submit that until that is acted upon anything else is out of order.

"Mr. Mitchell: I think that the point of order should not be sustained, for the reason that the Joint Convention of miners and operators is a continuous body. There is no final dissolution of our sessions at the end of our conventions each year. We adjourn to meet a year from the date of the convention then closing. Consequently the organization of this convention does not mean the organization of a new convention. This is a continuation of a convention held two years ago, and it seems to me it is perfectly in order to extend the scope of our work to invite to participate with us in this convention the representatives of the operators and miners of other districts. I therefore believe the motion is not out of order.

"Mr. W. S. Bogle: Mr. Mitchell has made the strongest argument possible in favor of the report of the Credentials Committee. The original call that inaugurated this movement included these four states, and the call since that time has not been changed. Therefore no credentials committee can consider the credentials of any states or districts outside of the call. It is perfectly outside of the province of a credentials committee to take cognizance of credentials from a body of men who were not included in the call. I will admit that it is a part and parcel of the convention to take up and consider whether or not it will enlarge its scope and take in additional territory. That is a matter that may properly come before this convention at any time; but to attempt to put it into the report of the Credentials Committee is absurd. Mr. Mitchell himself has given the best argument against it. I will ask the secretary to read the original call for the convention in Chicago and at the same time the call for this convention. No Credentials Committee can go outside of the call. I have been informed that the original call included West Virginia. The operators at all times have been willing to welcome West Virginia.

"Mr. Mitchell: Why don't you bring the operators from West Virginia here?

"Mr. Bogle: Why don't you bring them? If it was not for the check-off system granted you by the operators of these four states your organization would not last two years. We are giving your organization its strength here today. It is not you; it is not these delegates; it is the gentlemen seated on this side of the hall that are making your organization what it is.

"Chairman Traer: Mr. Bogle, the motion is in regard to the admission of other States.

"Mr. Chris Evans: Mr. Bogle made the statement that he understood the original call included West Virginia. For the information of this convention I wish to state that the original call included all the States and territories. At the convention that adopted the first scale of prices, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois and West Virginia were all represented. The original call, however, included all the states and territories. I make this statement because I sent out the first circular for such a convention.

"Mr. Bogle: I would like to have the secretary read the original call for the Chicago convention of 1898. Mr. Evans is confusing the record; he is going back to some ancient history, to some other movement that died a natural death and was revived in 1897, followed by a convention that met in 1898. If there is any question about that I would like to have read the call for this convention.

"Chairman Traer: Mr. Lewis has asked for the floor. The chair will recognize Mr. Lewis if he will postpone his argument until the secretary has read the call for this convention.

"Secretary W. B. Wilson read the following:

" 'Further, in pursuance of the authority vested in us, we hereby call a Joint Convention of the coal operators and miners of Western Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana and Illinois to meet at Indianapolis, Indiana, at 10 o'clock a. m., January 25, 1906.'

"Mr. Bogle: I renew my point of order. The Committee on Credentials, in making its report, can take cognizance of no other credentials than from the operators and miners included in the call. I will ask the ruling of the chair on that point.

"Chairman Traer: A point of order has been raised upon which it will be necessary for the chair to rule before discussion is in order. The Interstate Agreement for the two years beginning April 1, 1904, and ending March 31, 1906, provides, in addition to the various numbered articles which it contains, the clause which has just been read by the secretary.

"Gentlemen, the agreement upon which this meeting was called leaves the chair no option as to the decision as to who the preliminary members and as to who the members entitled to participation in the organization of this convention shall be. Plainly, from the agreement which has just been read, the original organization of this convention contemplates the admission only of the members from the operators and miners of the States mentioned in this agreement. If it is desired by either the operators or the miners of either or all of the states to introduce into this organization additional members, that is a matter which should be brought up and passed upon the same as any other matter, submitted to this convention. The chair has no option but to rule that upon the report of the Credentials Committee the point of order is well taken. The organization of this convention must be based upon the agreement under which it was called.

"The motion is upon the adoption of the report of the Credentials Committee.

"Mr. T. L. Lewis, Ohio: I would like to ask a question of the chair.

"Chairman Traer: Proceed, Mr. Lewis.

"Mr. Lewis: According to the ruling of the chair this convention must first pass upon the report of the Committee on Credentials with reference to the four States.

"Chairman Traer: That is correct, Mr. Lewis.

"Mr. Lewis: And the admission of any other state is to be an after consideration? Is that correct?

"Chairman Traer: That is correct. The motion is upon the adoption of the report of the Credentials Committee. The secretary will call the roll.

"(Secretary Wilson called the roll of the States. All the operators voted in the affirmative; all the miners voted in the affirmative.)

"Chairman Traer: The vote is unanimous, and the report of the Credentials Committee is adopted.

"Mr. Mitchell: I now renew my motion not as an amendment, but as a motion. I move that the miners and operators of the States of Kansas, Missouri, Arkansas, Texas and Indian Territory be admitted to the joint conference and granted the same privileges accorded to the operators and miners from the States comprising the Central Competitive Coal Field. (Seconded by Secretary Wilson.)

"Mr. Mitchell: In support of this motion I wish to make a few remarks. This is not the first time that the operators and miners of the Central Competitive Coal Field have departed from the rule which limits participation in this conference to the four districts which have been accorded representation here. A few years ago the operators and miners of Central Pennsylvania came to Indianapolis, made application for a seat in our joint conference, and were accorded that right. Mr. Robinson, of the Buffalo, Rochester & Pittsburg Coal Company, of Central Pennsylvania, was not only admitted to the conference, but served for a short time on the Scale Committee. So that in asking that the scope of our work be extended so as to include the miners and operators of the Southwestern States we are establishing no new precedent. But, aside from that it seems to me that it would be to our mutual advantage if we can bring into this conference the representative operators and miners of not only the Southwestern states, but the operators and miners of every coal-producing State in the Union.

"These States west of the Mississippi River—and I want to speak particularly of Iowa—are competitive with coal produced in the States east of the Mississippi River. Coal mined in Pennsylvania, in Ohio, in Indiana and in Illinois is sold in the same market as the coal produced in all of these states seeking admission here. There can be no doubt in the minds of either operators or miners that it is desirable to establish a wage scale that will be practically the same in every State and in every territory where coal is mined and sold in a common market. And it seems to me that incalculable benefit will accrue to the coal industry if we can bring into closer affiliation and harmonius co-operation at least the men who own the mines of these various States, to say nothing of the benefits that will come from bringing into co-operation the men who work in the mines. The trouble too often has been that you gentlemen have not worked in harmony one with the other, and too often we have had to suffer because of friction among the men who employ us. I trust, Mr. Chairman, that the proposition to include these Southwestern States, whose operators and miners are here, will be adopted, and that we shall hereafter invite to meet us the miners and operators of every State where the men are organized and where coal is mined and meets your product in competition."

p. 5, l. 7–66.
p. 6, l. 1–66.
p. 7, l. 1–18.

(246) "Mr. H. L. Chapman: It has been now twenty years since I started out with John McBryde and Chris Evans, both of whom are here, I believe, although many of the others have passed over the river, to attempt to organize, carry on and perpetuate the Interstate Agreement for the benefit of the operators and miners of the four competitive States. We have met here this year, after a two years' recess, for the purpose of again seeing if we can, in this competitive field, establish and retain the present relations that have existed between us for so many years. Each of you operators and each of you miners who have participated in these conventions know full well the difficulties that have attended this movement. On several occasions it has well nigh gone. It has required the patience, the conservatism and the arguments of the level-headed operators and miners to perpetuate it. It will require the same in the future to perpetuate it. As you all know, it has been demonstrated in the past that whenever you add another State to the movement it makes it that much more difficult for the four States to get an agreement. While I have been connected with the movement for a great many years, I am today not familiar with all the conditions even in my own state, nor am I familiar with all the conditions in Pennsylvania, Illinois or Indiana; much less do I know the conditions that exist in any of these outlying districts. What does an Ohio operator or an Ohio miner, except those who have been in those outlying districts, know concerning the matters there? What business have we to attempt to fix a scale of wages for men a thousand miles away from us, and for operators a thousand miles away from us? The conditions are entirely different; the markets are entirely different. We in Ohio do not come into competition to any extent with any of the districts named. If the miners would bring in our sister States of Virginia and West Virginia, we would admit them. We have tried to bring in the operators, but have failed. Let us look at the conditions there. In 1903 the State of West Virginia produced 26,882,000 tons of coal; in 1904, 30,222,000 tons, and the estimated production for 1905 is 35,000,000 tons. In Ohio in 1903 we produced 24,573,000 tons; in 1904, we produced 24,583,000 tons, an increase of 10,000 tons in one year. Although the statistics for 1905 are not yet out, I do not think Ohio will show an increase of anything in 1905. What does this argue? That this State of West Virginia is taking away steadily the trade of the miners and operators in Ohio. Our people undoubtedly would be in better condition today, so far as the operators are concerned, if they had a free rein against West Virginia, with the cheap labor they have over there, but we do not want it. We want the conditions of our people in our State to be just as good as we can make them, and we are willing to stand by the movement, and trust in the future that something may occur to bring those people in, or to prevent their taking away any more of our trade.

"You miners want to consider this proposition carefully and seriously. Consider whether or not you are not, by increasing this territory, bringing about a condition of things that will eventually ruin the movement that has done so much for all in the competitive field. These people in the Southwest that you are seeking to take in have an organization with which you meet and fix a scale. You have your organization there. We have no objection to it. We say God-speed in your movement in the Southwest, but do not make this thing so big and difficult to handle that you destroy it. That is what the operators fear, to say nothing about the business proposition connected with it. These gentlemen have no right to come in here, and we have no right to let them in. We are a close corporation so far as these four States are concerned, between the miners and operators. Unless you can demonstrate by different arguments from those you have presented on this and on former occasions, that there is something in it, we will continue to object to the admission of those States. As Mr. Robbins has said, our convention has voted against the proposition today as a solid wall. In the interest of the men that are laboring for us in the competitive field, we refuse to let these districts in. It seems strange to me that this question should be brought in year after year. It was threshed out years ago. The same arguments have been used year after year by the miners and the operators. We have not changed in any respect. I do not question your sincerity in the least; you cannot question the sincerity of the operators from their side. I think that is all I desire to say at the present on this proposition."

(247) "I may be an idealist or a dreamer, but I hope to see the day when every coal-producing field in the United States will participate in this joint conference."

Mr. Green.
p. 12, l. 40–42.

(248) "The gentleman on the other side spoke of what we are doing in West Virginia. I desire to answer that question by stating that we have men in that State trying to organize the miners. While doing so we meet with opposition from people who claim they are law-abiding citizens, who claim that they respect the law, and they respect it to the extent that they hire thugs to assault the men we put in there to organize that field."

Mr. Lewis.
p. 19, l. 14–19.

(249) "Mr. Mitchell and Mr. Lewis make the great mistake of always talking as though the organization controlled all the coal mined in this country, when, as a matter of fact, you do not control it, and there is where the increase and the low prices are coming from, and that is what we are meeting."

Mr. Robbins.
p. 25, l. 57–60.

(250) "I might say, while I am on my feet, in reply to one statement made here, that the miners' representatives discussed these questions on the assumption that we control all of the coal mines in the country, that I have never attempted to discuss these questions from that standpoint. I know we do not control all of the mines in the country, or at least we have not in the past; but we are in better position now in case we fail to agree, to control the mining industry of this country than we have ever been before."

(251) "Mr. Dolan: Haven't you the power to discharge a man over in Ohio if he does what is wrong, or if he does that which is not for the best interests of the company?

"Mr. Chapman: I question that proposition.

"Mr. Dolan: Then it is up to the officials of that district to see whether or not a man who loads dirty coal cannot be discharged. I know they discharge them in the Pittsburgh District if they do wrong.

"Mr. Haskins: Whenever men do anything wrong, of course they are discharged. A superintendent, while he is angry, of course, does not decide the question. Any man who does wrong in Ohio is discharged, but it isn't all one-sided. The man has a hearing."

p. 38, l. 32–42.

(252) "Mr. Dolan: I don't agree with the way Mr. Haskins answered my question when I asked if the operators of Ohio had the power to discharge a man if he did wrong. He said the men there had a hearing. The men in the Pittsburgh District get a hearing, but we have sense enough in Pittsburgh to let a man go when we know he has done wrong.

"Mr. Haskins: I will say for Ohio that we have as much discretion as they have in Pittsburgh. I answered the question as well as I knew how. I meant that in Ohio when the operators desired to discharge a man the matter is taken up with our people. We will not, as a general proposition, permit operators to indiscriminately discharge our men, and if they do so, we will strike for that as quickly as we will for 10 cents a ton."

p. 39, l. 40–50.

(253) "Mr. Mitchell: I never, either officially or personally, said to Mr. Schleuderberg or anyone else that I was not in favor of a uniform scale for outside labor. If I have been one thing I have been consistent in a demand for a uniform scale for outside day labor; so much so, so much concerned have I been about the outside day men, that I went to Pittsburgh to attend two different meetings, and served notice on the Pittsburgh operators that I would stop every mine in the Pittsburgh District if I had to fill the mines with organizers, in order to get a 20 per cent advance for outside day labor."

p. 58, l. 49–56.

(254) "Mr. Penna: I don't see why the miners should inject such a proposition into this meeting. The eight-hour day was conceded in the Chicago convention, and it has never been enforced by you people. You have never kept your contract in that particular. The keeping of your contract has been the exception; the violating of it the rule. A minority of the miners work the eight-hour day, and you have not done anything to enforce the eight-hour day at all. Your treatment of the eight-hour day has been such as to endanger it and make it repulsive to men who opposed it at that time and predicted just what would come of it. The advocates of the eight-hour day in Chicago were confronted with prophecies as to how it would be enforced. It has been demonstrated that those prophecies were true. We are surrounded by men working nine and ten hours a day, and the coal they produce competes with ours. Before you have made that proposition of the eight-hour day an established fact you want to shorten the hours. If conditions are not bettered it will only be a question of opportunity before you lose the eight-hour day. You are not making converts to the eight-hour day proposition, and to come in here and try to enforce a seven-hour day I think is very poor policy, and comes with poor grace from you gentlemen. Every attempt has been made to destroy the eight-hour day in a local way. The first thing the Indiana miners did, after coming from the Chicago convention, was to declare that under no circumstances would a miner go into a coal mine on an idle day. They had no right to do it; the contract did not prohibit them doing so. The contract had been made on the same basis that other contracts had, and such a change would embarrass the operators. In a subsequent year we were able to get a clause making it compulsory upon them to go in and timber their places if it was made necessary by shooting at the quitting time the night before. This same restrictive policy, the same meddlesome interference is what brings the eight-hour day into disrepute. A machine man is allowed to work in the mine eight hours a day, and if for any reason he stays out and the loaders after a machine have to go home, the next day that man is not allowed to go in and do cutting so his loaders will have work on the following day. The whole tendency of our people has been to restrict and restrict, cut down and establish themselves as watchmen to see how little could be done and how many restrictions could be made to prevent work. If we have a scale made in this convention we ought to have something to say about that eight-hour day. We want it arranged so that there will be no dispute about it between operators and miners anywhere when we leave here. We believe the consent of this side of the house to require the miners to work eight hours per day or forty-eight hours per week does carry with it an obligation on the part of the miner to work that forty-eight hours when the work is provided. If that is not the case, then the operators have not taken advantage of their rights to work more than forty-eight hours without any consideration. When we agree not to ask the miners to work more than forty-eight hours in a week they ought to be willing to work that many hours, and if for any reason they do not work one day they ought not to be prevented from working the following day, even though the mine is idle, when their absence is going to decrease the output of the mine."
